I. INTRODUCTION

I. INTRODUCTION

A. BACKGROUND AND PURPOSE

1. In compliance with its mandate under Article 41 of the American Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter "ACHR") and Article 106 of the OAS Charter to provide advice to States on human rights matters, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (hereinafter "IACHR" or "Commission") provides a technical cooperation tool aimed at contributing to the strengthening of the legislation, policies and practices of States in order to move towards the fullest protection of human rights. This document on the standards of the Inter-American Human Rights System (hereinafter "System" or "IAHRS") is also addressed to civil society, social movements, academia, and other users of the System.
2. On this occasion, and as a complement to the Compendium of the Commission on Truth, Justice and Reparation in Transitional Contexts -published in April 2021-, the IACHR presents this Compendium as a tool for promotion, dissemination and technical cooperation, which aims to systematize standards developed by the Commission for more than two decades, through its various mechanisms, on comprehensive reparation in transitional justice contexts² , with emphasis on the incorporation of a gender and intersectional approach.
3. Historically, the Inter-American Commission has closely followed the grave human rights violations that have occurred in the Americas, both in the context of armed conflict and in the context of military

² Transitional justice has been understood as "a variety of processes and mechanisms associated with a society's attempts to resolve the problems arising from a past of large-scale abuses - in order to hold those responsible accountable for their actions; to serve justice and achieve reconciliation". dictatorships and other oppressive and authoritarian regimes of the past³ . Through its various mechanisms, the IACHR has developed a series of applicable standards on truth, justice, memory, and reparation with recommendations for an integrated State response to transitional justice contexts⁴ . In the framework of this follow-up, and as will be reflected throughout the Compendium, the IACHR has accompanied the various regional advances and challenges in this area. In this regard, one of the main challenges observed in the region consists of gaps and inadequacies in the incorporation and application of a gender perspective and differentiated and intersectional approaches with respect to women, LGBTI persons, and other groups at risk. This prevents the development of reparation policies that respond to the prevalence of discrimination and violence.

4. In order to have an adequate and comprehensive State response to the serious violations that have occurred in transitional contexts and in order to energize the respective peace processes, the IACHR has issued numerous recommendations to States to comprehensively remedy the consequences of these violations. Similarly, in recent years, the Commission has spoken out on the various forms of discrimination and violence faced by women, LGBTI persons, and other population groups in the context of armed conflicts and authoritarian regimes. In addition, the Commission has addressed the accentuated and exacerbated vulnerability that these populations face in the face of the convergence of various layers of discrimination.
5. The specific objectives of the Compendium are: (i) to make visible the historical work of the IACHR regarding the application of the gender perspective in transitional justice contexts, with a particular focus on reparations, based on the attention given to certain groups in situations of vulnerability from an intersectionality approach; (ii) to reflect the importance of the design, implementation, and application of reparations with a transformative vocation that seeks to remedy the conditions of discrimination based on gender and other discriminatory factors that have been the cause of the violations⁵, and (iii) to highlight the fundamental importance of transitional justice mechanisms -especially that of reparations- to address the consequences of serious human rights violations in the context of armed conflicts, dictatorships and authoritarian regimes.

6. Regarding the first point, this Compendium is the first instrument in which the IACHR addresses, in a comprehensive and historical manner within the Inter-American System, the gender and intersectional perspective adopted in reparations adopted in the framework of transitional justice processes and mechanisms. Therefore, the Commission considers that this document will allow for a better understanding of the scope of the State's obligations to provide reparations with differentiated and intersectional approaches, in light of the principle of equality and non-discrimination.
7. On the other hand, this Compendium emphasizes the transformative nature of reparations, which, by having a corrective approach -and not only a restitutive one- contributes to the goal of comprehensive reparations, as well as to eradicating and combating discriminatory, unequal, and exclusionary structures and practices that have maintained a situation of systematic inequity, and which initially allowed or facilitated the commission of serious violations.
8. Regarding reparations as a fundamental contribution to combating the structural impunity of past events and to consolidating a culture of human rights in order to strengthen the rule of law in the region, this systematization, like the one presented in the, seeks to highlight

9. In response to what has been developed, the Commission seeks for this Compendium to constitute a dissemination tool that will facilitate the design, execution, implementation, and follow-up of reparations dictated in transitional justice contexts. This, in light of the IACHR's pronouncements aimed at guaranteeing comprehensive reparations for victims, based on a gender, differential, and intersectional perspective in all reparations processes and mechanisms, as well as the guiding principles of these mechanisms in transnational contexts -such as the representativeness and participation of women and other groups in the design and adoption of these measures.

B. METHODOLOGY

10. This document was prepared based on the review, identification, compilation, systematization, and analysis of the inter-American standards developed by the IACHR on transitional justice, in particular with regard to comprehensive reparations, with emphasis on a gender perspective, and differentiated and intersectional approaches. This compendium also includes the review, systematization, and analysis of standards and precedents applicable to reparations with a differentiated approach that may be applicable or relevant to transitional justice contexts. In order to present an updated, representative, and complete instrument, the Compendium included an exhaustive review of numerous IACHR pronouncements, published from 2000 to August 2023. Exceptionally, and because they are considered to be of special relevance to particular issues, a limited number of pronouncements prior to 2000 are used.

11. In particular, the following were examined and analyzed: (i) cases referred to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (hereinafter "IACtHR" or "Inter-American Court") - applications and merits reports subsequent to the 2009 reform of the Rules of Procedure of the IACtHR-, (ii) merits reports published by the IACHR; (iii) friendly settlement reports; (iii) country reports; (iv) thematic reports; (v) chapters of Annual Reports; (vi) resolutions; (vii) practical guides, guidelines, and other directives; (viii) resolutions on precautionary measures; and (ix) exceptionally, press releases were considered due to the uniqueness of the subject matter ⁷.
12. Based on the information compiled and analyzed, the Commission seeks to reflect the way in which it has understood, applied, and developed the standards related to the implementation of the gender and intersectional perspective in transitional contexts with emphasis on reparation measures for human rights violations in these situations. This Compendium also includes some relevant excerpts from decisions of the Inter-American Court and bodies of the universal system for the protection of human rights, which have been referred to by the IACHR.
13. Taking into account the technical cooperation purpose of the Compendium, the methodology used for the selection of the standards compiled responds to a greater extent to the comprehensive identification of the following criteria: (i) relevance in terms of substantive pertinence and recurrence of the approaches; (ii) most recent adoption; (iii) geographic representativeness; and (iv) balance between different mandates of the IACHR. The above also shows the complementarity in which the different mechanisms of the Commission are combined. In addition, it is important to note that the standards are organized thematically and presented in chronological order, from the most recent to the oldest, in order to highlight the latest advances in the field.

⁷ The IACHR in its press releases identifies human rights standards; it bases its specific pronouncements on these standards, and expressly cites them in press releases to support its recognitions, appeals, exhortations and conclusions. However, press releases, as documents of this nature, refer to standards but do not imply their development or issuance.

14. Although the standards included in this Compendium are not exhaustively integrated, the respective parts of the analysis that precede the standards included are accompanied by numerous citations and references to other precedents that allow for the expansion of the information to be consulted. Finally, it should be noted that the legal nature of the compendium is to present and systematize the standards developed by the IACHR and the Inter-American System through its mechanisms, without including the development of new standards on the subject.

C. STRUCTURE

15. This Compendium is divided into five chapters. Chapter I contains the purpose, background, methodology, and structure. Second, Chapter II presents the Commission's standards related to the application of a gender perspective in general aspects of transitional justice contexts, specifically in relation to the mechanisms of memory, truth, and justice. The chapter is organized into two sections: the first focuses on specific aspects related to the gender perspective, while the second part details the Commission's standards related to the principle of equality and non-discrimination.
16. Chapter III contains some general considerations on reparations measures in transitional processes; it also systematizes the standards with respect to the different types of reparations. In a cross-cutting manner, and in light of differentiated and intersectional approaches, this chapter includes elements related to comprehensive and transformative reparations for groups at special risk.
17. Chapter IV includes an approach to reparations with a gender and intersectional approach in the context of transitional justice. In particular, a review is made of emblematic reparations and recommendations issued by the IACHR through its various mechanisms. Likewise, considering the widespread use of sexual violence against women in transitional contexts, the aspects related to reparations in cases of sexual violence are highlighted. Considering the pronouncements made by the Commission to date, the analysis that presents the standards developed also includes some jurisprudential criteria of the Inter-American Court, and pronouncements of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of non-recurrence. Finally, in Chapter V, the IACHR presents its conclusions.

II. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS ON GENDER IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE CONTEXTS

II. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS ON GENDER IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE CONTEXTS

18. It is a principle of international law, which jurisprudence has considered "even a general conception of law", that any breach of an international obligation which has caused damage entails a duty to make adequate reparation⁸. This principle was consolidated in the decision of the International Court of Justice in the Chorzów Factory case of 1928⁹, which specified that the obligation to make reparation arising from a wrongful act implies undoing the consequences of that act and re-establishing the situation that would have existed had it not been committed.
19. This premise was later integrated into the draft articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, which establish that the responsible State has the obligation to make full reparation for the damage caused by the wrongful act¹⁰. In this way, responsibility is configured as a legal institution that imposes on the State responsible for an unlawful act, according to international law, the obligation to make reparation to the State affected by said act¹¹.
20. For its part, the development of international human rights law has made it possible to incorporate a new conception of the international responsibility of the State. Here, responsibility is no longer defined by a relationship between States, so the object of protection and its basis find a different justification¹². State responsibility arises when a State violates the fundamental obligation to respect and ensure respect for internationally recognized human rights. In this regard, the Inter-American Court has stated:

"The Court must emphasize, however, that modern human rights treaties in general, and the American Convention in particular, are not multilateral treaties of the traditional type, concluded for the reciprocal exchange of rights for the mutual benefit of the contracting States. Their object and purpose is the protection of the fundamental rights of human beings, regardless of their nationality, both vis-à-vis their own State and vis-à-vis the other contracting States. In adopting these human rights treaties, States submit themselves to a legal order within which they, for the common good, assume various obligations, not in relation to other States, but towards individuals under their jurisdiction..."¹³

21. In the field of international human rights law, different rights of individuals as victims of unlawful acts have been recognized, including those related to reparation measures¹⁴. In 2006, the General Assembly of the United Nations (UN) approved the Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.
22. In addition, Article 63 of the American Convention on Human Rights establishes that when the Inter-American Court decides that there has been a violation of a right or freedom protected by the Convention, it shall order reparation for the consequences of the measure or situation that led to the violation of those rights and the payment of fair compensation to the injured party. This article reflects the maxim that any violation of an international obligation that has caused damage entails the duty to make adequate reparation for it.
23. For its part, the jurisprudence of the Inter-American System has established on several occasions that the victims of human rights violations have the right to adequate reparation for the harm suffered, which must take the form of individual measures aimed at restitution, compensation, and rehabilitation of the victim, as well as general measures of satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition¹⁵.

24. In this sense, States that are responsible for human rights violations attributed to them as a result of their acts or omissions are obliged to provide comprehensive reparation to the victims¹⁶. The full and adequate satisfaction of the right to integral reparation must guarantee that the reparation is proportional to the violation suffered, its gravity, and the damages suffered, that it contains individual measures aimed at restitution, compensation, and rehabilitation of the victim, as well as measures of satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition¹⁷. The obligation to guarantee reparation must be proportional, adequate, and fair¹⁸.
25. The development of inter-American jurisprudence has been prolific in the area of reparations and transitional justice, addressing the complex history of the countries of the region, characterized by multiple and repeated ruptures of the democratic and institutional order. Since its inception, the Inter-American System has dealt with determination with serious human rights violations arising from military dictatorships, armed conflicts, or other oppressive and authoritarian regimes of the past. In this regard, the Commission has been emphatic in highlighting and reminding States of the intrinsic relationship between truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of non-repetition, and the way in which these components of the transitional process do not replace one another, but rather complement and feed on each other¹⁹ .

26. However, as noted by the doctrine, for the most part, reparations programs in transitional societies lack explicit consideration of the gender dimension within the context of transitional justice²⁰. In this regard, the Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of non-recurrence has identified that "early reparations programs for victims of gross human rights violations did not address the specific forms of victimization experienced by women, nor did they seriously consider what aspects are critical to ensuring that reparations -whether material or symbolic, individual or collective- are not made turning a blind eye to the needs, interests or visions of women"²¹.
27. The Rapporteur recognizes that initially the "evolution was limited to expanding the catalog of violations deserving of reparations so that rape or sexual violence would not be systematically relegated"²² . However, as an achievement in this process of evolution, it is noteworthy that currently the explicit incorporation of a gender perspective in reparations programs is aimed at providing reparations for sexual crimes committed, and the identification of all those decisions on reparations that may have a differential impact between genders. This United Nations Special Rapporteur has identified the need to adopt similar perspectives in relation to lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender persons²³.

28. In this sense, the historical, doctrinal, and legal evolution has demanded an incipient incorporation of the gender perspective in a cross-cutting manner in the field of human rights, which implies a clear distance from any pretension of neutrality. This exercise requires the recognition of the particular circumstances faced by girls, adolescents, women and LGBTI persons as victims, considering the situation of structural discrimination they experience based on gender. This approach not only makes it possible to address the differentiated impacts that aggravate their initial vulnerability, specifically gender-based violence, but also facilitates the conceptualization of reparatory measures through an intersectional approach that allows for the comprehensive achievement of their objectives in transitional justice contexts.

29. In the Inter-American System, it should be noted that there have been important advances and developments in the jurisprudence in a progressive manner. Within this framework, it is worth noting that the Inter-American Court, in the “Campo Algodonero” case²⁴, established a relevant precedent by introducing the concept of transformative reparations in the case of human rights violations, with special attention to the gender component. The Inter-American Court stated that, in situations of structural discrimination, "reparations must have a transformative vocation, so that they have not only a restorative effect but also a corrective effect towards structural changes that dismantle those stereotypes and practices that perpetuate discrimination"²⁵.

30. For its part, the doctrine has underscored the importance of adopting reparations with a gender perspective in order to guarantee a comprehensive and transformative response to human rights violations²⁶. In this sense, it has been emphasized that the reparations ordered in the "Campo Algodonero" judgment, whose approach transcends simple restitution, explore the complex interaction of gender violence and discrimination that resulted in rights violations. In addition, the role of transformative reparations in addressing power disparities and structural inequalities in societies has been emphasized²⁷. Thus, transformative justice in reparations seeks to redress exclusion and inequality in historically marginalized contexts, advocating for restorative effects.
31. Likewise, the jurisprudence of the Inter-American System has consistently established reparations with a transformative vocation regarding discriminatory treatment based on the use of stereotypes, preconceptions or prejudices regarding persons or groups of persons based on their attributes, characteristics, social condition, among other conditions, in such a way that they have not only a restitutive but also a corrective effect towards structural changes that dismantle those stereotypes and practices that perpetuate discrimination against persons or populations historically discriminated against or in a situation of vulnerability²⁸.

32. However, and despite emblematic cases, the issue of violence against girls, women and LGBTI persons and its differentiated impact requires a comprehensive approach in transitional contexts. In this sense, transitional justice faces the challenge of including a cross-cutting gender perspective in all processes and mechanisms of truth, justice, memory, reparation and non-repetition²⁹. This cannot be reduced to the merits of the cases, but must also be a fundamental presupposition in reparation measures.
33. In relation to the vast development regarding reparations in transitional contexts, this systematization seeks to make visible the importance of including the gender perspective in transitional justice mechanisms, providing access to justice and reparations in light of the principle of equality and non-discrimination according to the particular and unique impact that each group experienced. In addition, the development in this area at the time of writing this compendium is presented as a tool for cooperation.
34. To that end, this chapter, examines the main standards developed by the Commission regarding the application of a gender perspective in the field of transitional justice; and is divided into two sections. The first section, on gender in transitional justice contexts, showcases specific issues related to gender, presenting the Commission's standards on the intersectional approach, the differential impact of human rights violations, the use of gender stereotypes, and the role of the gender and diversity perspective in the definition of victims and family members. The second section, on gender and non-discrimination, focuses on the standards corresponding to the principle of equality and non-discrimination, structural discrimination, indirect discrimination, and the interrelationship between violence, discrimination and access to justice.

35. The Commission has recognized the differentiated impact of gender-based human rights violations in these contexts, highlighting the aggravation of the situation of structural discrimination against women and LGBTI persons, advocating for intersectional responses with a transformative vocation. Likewise, the IACHR has played a systematic role in the protection of rights in contexts of transitional justice, considering it essential to promote and safeguard human rights in the region. Through its various mechanisms, the IACHR has established applicable standards on truth, justice, memory and reparation, offering recommendations to achieve a comprehensive State response to serious human rights violations. The Commission has made multiple recommendations to the States³⁰, urging them to adapt their domestic legislation, develop policies of recognition and redress, guarantee the non-repetition of past violations, and institutionally strengthen the systems of truth, justice and reparation for an effective response. In addition, the Commission has taken into account the differentiated impacts on particularly vulnerable or historically discriminated groups³¹.

A. THE GENDER PERSPECTIVE IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE CONTEXTS

36. Over the past few years, the Commission has developed and consolidated the notion of the gender perspective. In this sense, it has recognized that it is a key approach to combat discrimination and violence against women and people with diverse sexual orientations and gender identities³². This approach seeks to reveal the differentiated social valuation of people by virtue of their assigned or assumed gender, and evidences the unequal power relations originating in these differences³³. In addition, the Commission has considered that the gender approach "reveals the presence of an asymmetrical power structure that assigns differential values, positions and habits to each of the sexes and, therefore, structures a system of power relations accordingly, which has become a pervasive cultural, social, economic and political logic in all spheres of social relations"³⁴.

³⁰ In this section, the IACHR includes the review, systematization and analysis of standards and precedents applicable to reparations with a differentiated approach that may be applicable or relevant to transitional justice contexts, as indicated in the Methodology section above.

³¹ IACHR, Compendium on truth, memory, justice and reparation in transitional contexts, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 121, 12 April 2021.

37. This perspective seeks to make visible the position of inequality and structural subordination of women because of their gender, to eradicate the false premise that women are inferior to men and to make visible and address stereotypes and prejudices that facilitate discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientations and characteristics and diverse gender identities; the above, in the context of the hetero-cis-patriarchal system predominant in the region³⁵.
38. In this regard, the IACHR has reiterated that the gender perspective is a tool that seeks to: (i) make visible the position of inequality and structural subordination of women based on gender; (ii) eradicate the false premise that women are inferior to men; and (iii) make visible and address stereotypes and prejudices that contribute to discrimination based on sexual orientations, gender identities and diverse sexual characteristics³⁶.

39. The creation of the Rapporteurship on the Rights of Women in 1994 was vital to incorporate a gender perspective in the different mechanisms of the Commission. Since that decade, standards have been developed on the international obligations of States in relation to the prevention, investigation, punishment and reparation of human rights violations and their gender-differentiated impacts. Like girls and women, LGBTI people have also suffered the rigors of armed conflicts and dictatorships in a differential manner. In this regard, since 1993, the IACHR has received information on violence against LGBTI persons in the context of the armed conflict³⁷.
40. The Commission has recognized that peace-building and the strengthening of the rule of law in transitional justice contexts are objectives of society as a whole, but for these processes to be true and stable, they must include the voice of the people who have been most severely affected. The history of war, armed conflict or repression must be told with greater awareness of the forms of discrimination that operate in these contexts, which disproportionately affect girls, adolescents, women and LGBTI people. In this sense, it is not possible to achieve a complete history without the voice of these groups and without addressing the conflict from a gender perspective.
41. The IACHR has emphasized that the gender perspective must permeate public policies, administrative decisions, judicial resolutions and regulatory frameworks³⁸, as it is essential to combat the historical and structural inequality that affects women and LGBTI persons. However, despite emblematic cases in the Inter-American System³⁹, violence against these groups and its differentiated impact has not always been properly addressed in transitional justice contexts.

42. In this sense, transitional justice faces the challenge of mainstreaming a gender perspective in all processes and mechanisms of truth, justice, memory, reparation and non-repetition. In situations of dictatorship and armed conflict, structural factors of discrimination and violence, together with gender stereotypes, manifest themselves in various dynamics of victimization, exacerbating discrimination, violence and the vulnerability of women⁴⁰ and LGBTI persons⁴¹. Thus, the Commission has underscored the urgent need for investigations into human rights violations in these contexts to be conducted from a gender perspective and to be led by persons trained in the field. The Commission has also highlighted the importance of the active participation of women and LGBTI persons in transitional justice processes, ensuring that their voices are heard and considered in the formulation of policies and decisions.

the acts, whether because of the way she dresses, her occupation, sexual conduct, or her relationship or kinship with the aggressor, which translates into inaction on the part of prosecutors, police, and judges in response to reports of violent acts. Along these lines, the IACHR has indicated that the gender approach, accompanied by the intercultural approach, makes it possible to recognize the special position of indigenous and tribal women, and to adopt culturally appropriate measures that guarantee the enjoyment of their rights and fundamental freedoms, and allow them to live a life free of discrimination and violence⁴⁶ . The Commission considers that, through these approaches, States must guarantee the protection of the rights of indigenous and tribal women and their access to justice and reparation for situations of human rights violations they face. They should also be applied to consultation and other participatory processes with indigenous and tribal peoples so that women can participate in internal decision-making processes, through means respectful of their customary

269. The Commission especially emphasizes that an analysis of the context must take into consideration the specific vulnerability of some groups of defenders and apply a gender, ethnic, racial and cultural perspective at this stage of the analysis. The defense of groups that have historically been subject to patterns of structural discrimination may entail additional risks and require the State to adopt a differentiated approach in the context analysis. This implies, for example, taking into consideration all forms of discrimination and stereotypes that women historically face, which accentuate the risk when carrying out their work as human rights defenders. For example, in the Teresa Arce et al. case, the Court established that there existed in Colombia, at that time, a situation of insecurity and violence perpetrated against women human rights defenders, due to the armed conflict and the prominent role they play in their community and as community leaders; all of which endangered their lives, personal integrity, families and their ability to carry out their work⁴⁸. In contexts such as these, the risk assessment carried out by the State must include historical gender discrimination and stereotypes and how these accentuate the risks of violence and harassment.

1. Concept of intersectional approach and applicability to transitional contexts

44. Throughout its decisions, the Commission has integrated and applied the intersectional approach in addressing human rights violations. Intersectionality focuses on the cross-cutting convergence of various factors of vulnerability and risk of discrimination⁵⁰, which the IACHR has identified as an overlapping layer of discrimination with differentiated gender-based impacts on women⁵¹ and LGBTI persons. This approach makes it possible to examine how the violation of rights affects each person differently, considering these factors, and highlights the need to implement specific or intersectional measures to prevent, correct or redress rights violations.
45. The IACHR has noted that the doctrinal evolution of this approach has been incorporated into the jurisprudence of the Inter-American Court⁵², which has shown that social inequalities arise from the intersection of various factors such as gender, national origin, sexual orientation, migratory status and socioeconomic status, triggering contexts of discrimination⁵³.
46. The inclusion of an intersectional approach coupled with a gender perspective in transitional justice contexts is based on the

363. The CERD in its General Comment No. 32 has established that the principle of equal enjoyment of human rights is integral to the prohibition of discrimination in the Convention on Racial Discrimination on the basis of race, color, descent, and nationality or ethnic origin. It indicated that the grounds of discrimination are understood in practice by the notion of "intersectionality" whereby "the Committee refers to situations of double or multiple discrimination - such as discrimination on the basis of gender or religion - when discrimination appears to exist in combination with another ground or grounds listed in Article 1 of the Convention"⁵⁷ .

379. It should be noted that the group of victims in this case is composed of 446 Afro-descendant displaced victims of the armed conflict, of whom 117 are children, 195 are women, and a group of them are mothers who are heads of household. In this sense, the notion of intersectionality applies to this group of victims, in view of the fact that they suffer multiple forms of discrimination due to the combination of causes, among which are: their displaced status, their gender, ethnicity and status as children.

Finally, it is worth mentioning that the Convention of Belém do Pará identifies the victims affected in this case as belonging to groups particularly at risk of suffering acts of violence and discrimination based on several factors - being women, indigenous people, being deprived of their liberty and the context of internal armed conflict (Article 9)⁵⁸.

The IACHR has noted persistent, multiple forms of discrimination and violence experienced by Afro-descendant women with diverse sexual orientations and gender identities and/or expressions, with different factors intersecting, such as gender, race and extreme poverty, constituting triple historical discrimination⁵⁹. The Commission has highlighted the existence of various forms of violence experienced by women of African descent with non-normative sexual orientations and gender identities. By way of example, in the United States, several different organizations have reported that Afro-descendant trans women, and in general, trans women, are frequently the

139. In previous reports, the IACHR has stated that the intersectional discrimination persistently directed at Afro-descendant women in Colombia is not only due to reasons of race and gender; this group may face additional factors of discrimination and vulnerability in the specific context of the armed conflict. Taking into account the high level of vulnerability of this group to violence and poverty led the Commission to underscore the need for the Colombian State to adopt an intersectional approach to protect Afro-descendant women.

In particular, the CEDAW Committee has held that intersectionality is a core concept for understanding the scope of States' obligations, in that discrimination against women on the basis of sex and gender is indivisibly linked to other factors affecting women, such as race, ethnicity, religion or belief, health, status, age, class, caste, sexual orientation, and gender identity.

17. (...)In this sense, the measures of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-repetition in the context of transitional justice must take into account both the differentiated effects and observe the standards regarding the representativeness and participation of these groups and populations in the elaboration and adoption of these measures from an intersectional perspective, as observed in the Inter-American standards.

Practical Guides

IACHR, Guide on Best Practices and Basic Guidelines to Implement Decisions Made by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, Transformations Series 01, 2021 \(available in Spanish\).

The human rights approach in the investigation plans also implies that both the lines of investigation and the proceedings assume an intersectionality approach. That is, they must be able to identify the particular conditions of the type of violations committed -for example, acts of sexual violence, torture or forced disappearance- as well as of the victims who suffered them. This implies the need for research plans to develop strategies that consider the diverse needs and particularities of specific groups such as women, children and adolescents, indigenous people, missing persons, migrants, LGBTI people, persons deprived of liberty, among others.

2. The differential impact of human rights violations in transitional contexts: Violence and access to justice.

47. In the framework of transitional justice, the IACHR has recognized the differentiated and, in many cases, aggravated impact that conflicts have on the rights of victims, due to specific factors of vulnerability, structural or historical discrimination, as well as the intersection of these elements. In this sense, the Commission has established that the measures of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-repetition in transitional justice contexts must consider the differentiated affectations and comply with the standards of representativeness and participation of these groups and populations. This must be approached from an intersectional perspective, as established by Inter-American standards.
48. The IACHR has noted that groups in vulnerable situations, such as women, indigenous people, displaced persons, human rights defenders and LGBTI persons, face differentiated and intersectional discrimination. In armed conflicts and authoritarian contexts, violence against girls, women and LGBTI persons intensifies and takes on particular forms. In this sense, sexual violence has been used as a form of planned and systematic repression to denigrate victims in dictatorial contexts and internal armed conflict in the Americas⁶³.
49. The IASHR has addressed various cases that show sexual violence, murders, forced pregnancies, theft of babies, disappearances, sexual torture, among other forms of gender-based violence in contexts of armed conflict. In these cases, the Commission has recognized the particular forms of violence and has emphasized that sexual and reproductive violence in these contexts does not occur in isolation, but is the result of the aggravation of violence that continues to be rooted in historical and structural discrimination. In this regard, the IACHR has emphasized the importance of addressing the obstacles to access to justice, proposing the adoption of uniform protocols and the training of state officials. It has also urged States to investigate, prosecute and punish sexual and reproductive

Said vulnerability is reinforced by their rural origin and, in general, it especially affects women -who are heads of households and constitute more than half the displaced population-, girls and boys, youths, and elderly persons. The internal displacement crisis, in turn, generates a security crisis, given that groups of internally displaced persons become a new focus or recruitment resource for paramilitary, drug trafficking and guerrilla groups⁶⁵.

68. The violence exercised in the armed conflict victimized women in a differential and aggravated manner. [...] Likewise, the armed conflict exacerbated and deepened the pre-existing discrimination, exclusion and gender violence in the country⁶⁷. In this context, sexual violence against women in Colombia has been a common, widespread, systematic and invisible practice in the country, committed by all the illegal armed groups and in isolated cases by agents of the security forces. Moreover, the most serious aspect of this type of violence, according to the Constitutional Court, is that there is official and unofficial invisibility, silence on the part of the victims and impunity for the perpetrators⁶⁸.

indigenous women play in their community, the Inter-American Commission has observed that sexual violence, killings and forced disappearances in Colombia's armed conflict have created the "risk of physical and cultural extermination" of numerous indigenous peoples⁸⁸ . IACHR, Violence and Discrimination Against Women in The Armed Conflict in Colombia. OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 67, October 18, 2006

48. Based on field observations and testimonies received, the Rapporteur has identified four main manifestations of violence that particularly affect women in the armed conflict. First, the actors in the armed conflict use different forms of physical, psychological and sexual violence to "harm the enemy", either by dehumanizing the victim, violating her nuclear family and/or inflicting terror on her community, in order to gain control of territories and resources. In this type of violence, women may be direct targets or collateral victims, as a result of their affective relationships as daughters, mothers, wives, partners, or sisters. Secondly, violence aimed at causing forced displacement from the territory and the consequent uprooting from their homes, daily lives, communities and families. Third, sexual violence that may accompany the forced recruitment of women for the purpose of making them provide sexual services to members of guerrilla or paramilitary forces. Fourth, violence aimed at making them the constant object of social control patterns imposed by illegal armed groups in populations or territories under their control. [...]

107. The IACHR has been able to corroborate that the situation of Afro-Colombian women living in the Pacific coast area is particularly precarious and worrisome. Both State authorities and non-State sources confirmed that the Afro-Colombian population suffers from a history of discrimination, exclusion, invisibility and social disadvantage, both economically and geographically. The armed conflict has aggravated this situation as armed actors take advantage of these disadvantages in their struggle to control territories and resources. In the particular case of Afro-Colombian women, their condition as women adds another factor of discrimination and vulnerability to their lives and exposes them to greater abuses by the actors in the conflict:

We women have been run over in our territory and in any place by the different groups and legal and illegal armed actors, who kidnap, kill, rape, humiliate leaving as a consequence with these acts the deterioration of the social fabric of our environment. For all of the above, there is no doubt that the armed conflict has damaged the sensitivity of black women, their ancestral legitimacy, their formative and life-generating creativity, their cultural identity and love for their territory⁹⁰ .

148. [...] the IACHR considers that the serious effects of the armed conflict on the lives of Colombian women and men take on a special dimension for indigenous women. Indeed, the pressure exerted by armed groups on indigenous territories, whether for reasons of military strategy or for economic reasons, has a particularly serious impact on the lives of indigenous women, since they perceive their ancestral territories as essential places for their existence, culture, and family. The main demand of indigenous women is that their territories be respected. As long as indigenous territories continue to be subject to military or economic interests, the lives of indigenous women will be in danger and, consequently, the cultural integrity and very existence of the peoples to which they belong.

IACHR, Situation of Human Rights in Guatemala OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 208/17, 31 December 2017

362. The Commission has noted that the end of the armed conflict did not mean the end of violence, especially for women, who do not enjoy their right to live a life free of violence. The Commission has been observing a scenario of violence in Guatemala, where most crimes are attributed to violence generated by criminal organizations, such as drug cartels and gangs or "maras". In this context, women are at heightened risk: maras tend to be male-dominated criminal structures, with macho hierarchies and practices of extreme violence. Women hardly occupy positions hierarchically superior to those of male members, and reproducing gender stereotypes, many women (mothers, sisters, partners) are considered "property" of the man and his gang. The submission and humiliation of women is part of the strategies of control and confrontation between gangs, which makes women particularly vulnerable to acts of extortion, threats, sexual violence, torture and murder.

IACHR, Report Truth, Justice and Reparation: Fourth Report on Human Rights Situation in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 49/13, 31 December 2013 2013

73. The IACHR notes that lesbians, gays, trans, bisexual and intersex persons have historically been subjected to discrimination and violence based on their sexual orientation and gender identity in Colombia; a situation exacerbated by the armed conflict, manifested mainly in two aspects: acts of violence (murders, attacks and threats) by armed groups, who make these persons a military target, and forced displacement. This situation of discrimination and violence is aggravated by a social and political context in which the recognition of certain rights of LGBTI persons is being disputed in a process of high political contention. On the other hand, the IACHR observes that, although there has been progress in terms of state measures to prevent and punish violence against these people, they have not been effective. Thus, it is observed that the situation of violence is generalized throughout the country and is concentrated on gay men, trans women, lesbian women, as well as LGBTI human rights activists and defenders. [...]

IACHR, Honduras: Human Rights and the Coup d'État, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 55, 30 December 2009

198. The IACHR has received information revealing that, since the coup d'état, situations of discrimination have worsened with respect to certain social groups that have historically been excluded and discriminated against in Honduras. In particular, there has been a worsening of the situation of foreigners, mainly of Nicaraguan origin, Garifunas and members of the gay community.

518. The IACHR received numerous testimonies revealing that, both during the repression of demonstrations and in the context of illegal detentions, women were subjected to verbal aggression and sexual violence. In this regard, the Inter-American Court has held that acts of violence directed specifically at women and sexual violence are often used as "a symbolic means to humiliate the opposing party"⁹¹ . Likewise, the Commission has repeatedly established that rape committed by agents of the State constitutes torture.

3. Use of gender stereotypes

50. The IASHR has a long history of work in making visible the multiple factors that perpetuate gender discrimination. Among these factors, the IACHR has identified machismo, patriarchy and the prevalence of sexist stereotypes, as well as historical discrimination connected to the social fabric, coupled with social tolerance of violence against women in all its dimensions: physical, psychological, sexual, economic and others. Both the Commission and the Court have found that the subordination of women is linked to practices rooted in socially dominant and socially persistent gender stereotypes. These discriminatory patterns are influenced by sociocultural values and ingrained notions that appeal to the supposed inferiority of women in relation to men based on their biological differences and their reproductive capacity and function⁹².

51. The IACHR has conceptualized gender stereotypes as preconceptions related to specific attributes or roles that men and women should fulfill respectively⁹³ . These socially entrenched stereotypes are not only manifestations of discrimination, but also causes and consequences of violence directed against women⁹⁴ and LGBTI persons. The IACHR has indicated that gender-based discrimination includes "any difference in treatment based on sex that, intentionally or in practice, places women at a disadvantage, and prevents the full recognition of their human rights in the public and private spheres."⁹⁵

52. Binding instruments such as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and the Convention of Belém do Pará, along with the work developed by the IACHR and the Inter-American Court, have recognized that the prevalence of discrimination, stereotypes and social and cultural practices is one of the causes and consequences of gender-based violence⁹⁶. In contexts of dictatorship and armed conflict, these factors are reflected in different dynamics of victimization, exacerbating gender-based discrimination, violence and defenselessness of women and LGBTI persons. In this regard, the Commission has underscored the importance of addressing stereotypes in the investigation of violence against women and discrimination against LGBTI persons. The IACHR understands that the consideration of these stereotypes implies that the obligations under the Convention of Belém do Pará benefit both cisgender and transgender women.

169. In this regard, the Court reiterates that gender stereotyping refers to a pre-conception of attributes, behaviors or characteristics possessed or roles that are or should be performed by men and women respectively, and that it is possible to associate the subordination of women to practices based on socially dominant and persistent gender stereotypes. In this sense, their creation and use becomes one of the causes and consequences of gender violence against women, conditions that are aggravated when they are reflected, implicitly or explicitly, in policies and practices, particularly in the reasoning and language of state authorities.

88. In this regard, the IACHR emphasizes that, in addition to opening lines of investigation that, from the beginning of the investigations in which there is relevant evidence, take into account the possibility that the motivation may have been based on prejudice, and to conduct investigations free of stereotypes related to diverse sexual orientations, identities, and gender expressions, States must take into consideration the general context of stereotypes, prejudice, and violence against LGBT persons in their countries, which may be more entrenched in places within the countries or outside the main cities. In addition, in conducting investigations, State authorities should rely on expert testimony from experts capable of identifying discrimination and prejudice against LGBT persons, which are entrenched in the societies of the region⁹⁷.

IACHR, Report No. 150/18, Case 12.954. Merits. Jineth Bedoya Lima et al. Colombia. December 7, 2018.

127. The IACHR emphasizes that discriminatory sociocultural patterns also have an impact on the investigation, prosecution, and punishment of cases of violence against women. In particular, the IACHR has explained that, by virtue of prevailing gender stereotypes, judicial operators tend to consider cases of violence as not a priority and do not carry out tests that are key to the investigation and punishment of the perpetrators. In addition, they give little credibility to the assertions of the victims; they disqualify them; they assign them responsibility for the facts reported "because of the way they dress, their occupation, sexual conduct, relationship or kinship with the aggressor"⁹⁸, and give them inadequate treatment when they try to collaborate in the investigation of the facts⁹⁹. In this sense, the Inter-American Court has made it clear that "the opening of lines of investigation into the prior social or sexual behavior of the victims in cases of gender violence is nothing more than the manifestation of policies or attitudes based on gender stereotypes"¹⁰⁰ about the socially acceptable roles and behaviors of women in

152. Regarding the concept of gender stereotype, the Inter-American Court has indicated that it is a preconception of attributes or characteristics possessed or roles that are or should be performed by men and women respectively¹⁰¹. The Court has pointed out that the creation and use of stereotypes becomes one of the causes and consequences of gender violence against women¹⁰². The Court has considered that the duty of non-discrimination is breached in cases where officials in charge of an investigation related to the disappearance or violence of a woman, make statements that denote the existence of prejudices and stereotypes about the social role of women¹⁰³.

59. The Commission notes with concern the increasing number of reports of gang rapes which, in some cases, have been used as instruments of punishment or repression by armed groups, especially against girls, who are perceived as more susceptible targets, or against women who are seen as socially perverted, promiscuous, rebellious, or who refuse to consent to sex¹⁰⁴.

Moreover, binding instruments such as CEDAW and the Convention of Belém do Pará have established that violence against women is based on and caused by elements of discrimination, stereotypes, social and cultural practices, based on the concept that women are inferior¹⁰⁵. Discrimination against women and gender stereotypes promote, validate, increase and aggravate violence against women. 186. The IACHR has warned that women defenders are continually confronted by individuals or groups who, in addition to reproaching their participation in public life and their leadership in the defense of human rights, their territories and their traditions, make use of sexist stereotypes to delegitimize their work¹⁰⁷ . In addition, women who defend issues that in themselves challenge established sociocultural patterns are also at an increased risk of facing specific acts of violence against them. Thus, women defenders engaged in the area of women's rights and, in particular, in the area of sexual and reproductive rights and the rights of lesbian, bisexual, trans, gender diverse and intersex (LBTI) women are especially delegitimized, attacked and assaulted both because they are women and because of the very rights they defend¹⁰⁸.

161. The IACHR observes that stigmatization and delegitimization have a differentiated impact on women human rights defenders, derived from traditional gender relations, which often intersect with the racial discrimination suffered by defenders of indigenous or Afro-descendant origin. Defamation against women defenders has a differentiated condition insofar as a significant number of these acts injure and violate their gender condition¹⁰⁹. In addition to the discrimination to which they are subjected due to their historical role and the stereotypical conceptions of gender that have been attributed to them, their situation is aggravated when they face their work in risky conditions due to the specific causes they promote. The IACHR has received numerous complaints about the violence that affects women in communities marked by a historical patriarchal conception, where they are subject to degrading social stereotypes of their sexual life, or are accused of attacking moral values or social institutions such as the family¹¹⁰.

society¹¹¹ . Thus, the Commission has observed that women human rights defenders are particularly exposed to violations of their rights to life and personal integrity, including various forms of violence against their families in retaliation for their work, and that deep-rooted gender stereotypes are repeatedly used against them to delegitimize their work¹¹² .

4. The role of the gender and diversity perspective in the definition of victim and family members

53. The Commission has recognized the tireless commitment of victims, family members, human rights defenders and organizations in the search for truth, justice and reparations in cases of human rights violations. Its fundamental role has gone beyond supporting investigations to include the promotion of essential legal and policy reforms to overcome obstacles to access to justice and truth¹¹³.

54. In this context, the IACHR has stated that the suffering inflicted on the victims' family members may constitute an additional violation of the right to humane treatment¹¹⁴ . In addition, the IACHR has also considered that family members can be considered victims in and of themselves, especially when fundamental rights such as life and personal integrity are violated. Factors such as the proximity of family ties, participation in the search, and the State's response to the efforts made are considered to determine this concept of victim. Likewise, the absence of effective judicial remedies constitutes an additional source of suffering for family members.

Regarding the gender and diversity perspective, the IACHR has addressed the specific victimization of women, highlighting particular situations such as those of women human rights defenders, indigenous women, journalists and trans women. The Commission has emphasized the importance of the active participation of women and LGBTI persons in transitional justice processes, recognizing their crucial role in the construction of truth, reconciliation and the reconstruction of the social fabric.
56. For its part, the Commission has recognized and highlighted the leadership of women as family members in the search for and defense of human rights in situations of forced and involuntary disappearance of persons. In this section, exceptionally, standards outlined in IACHR press releases are incorporated, where the specific situation of women searchers is addressed¹¹⁵ and the necessary measures to guarantee their protection are highlighted¹¹⁶.

established that “the obligation to investigate human rights violations is among the positive measures that the State must adopt to guarantee the rights established in the Convention. Additionally, the State must, if possible, try to reestablish a right that has been violated and, if applicable, repair the damage produced by human rights violations”¹²³. Accordingly, the Inter-American Court has held that the absence of effective remedies is a source of additional suffering and distress for victims’ relatives.

173. Based on the foregoing, the Commission considers that the disappearance of a loved one and the lack of a thorough and effective investigation which in turn causes pain if the truth is not revealed, in themselves constitute harm to the mental and moral integrity of the members of Mayra Angelina Gutiérrez's family. The IACHR also notes that Ms. Gutiérrez's family have said that they are also afraid that something similar might happen to them. It is clear to the Commission that the anguish that the victim's family have endured in the quest to obtain justice and uncover the truth about what happened, the lack of effective protection, and the profound suffering and radical change wrought on their lives have harmed their wellbeing.

194. In another case involving rape at the hands of members of the security forces during Peru's internal armed conflict, the IACHR described such actions as a form of psychological torture because its objective, in many cases, is not just to humiliate the victim but also her family or community:

Rape causes physical and mental suffering in the victim. In addition to the violence suffered at the time it is committed, the victims are commonly hurt or, in some cases, are even made pregnant. The fact of being made the subject of abuse of this nature also causes a psychological trauma that results, on the one hand, from having been humiliated and victimized, and on the other, from suffering the condemnation of the members of their community if they report what has been done to them¹²⁵.

imposed on the close relatives of the victims of serious human rights violations also constitute a violation of the right of those persons to humane treatment. 53. Based on international human rights case law, under certain circumstances, the anguish and suffering imposed on the close relatives of the victims of serious human rights violations also constitute a violation of the right of these persons to humane treatment¹²⁷. In this case, the IACHR holds the view that the treatment extended to Delia Pérez de González, who had to stand by helplessly and witness the abuse of her three daughters by members of the Mexican Armed Forces and then to experience, along with them, ostracism by her community, constitutes a form of humiliation and degradation that is a violation of the right to humane treatment guaranteed by the American Convention.

¹²⁷ The Inter-American Court established in the case of the "street children" of Guatemala that the victims had been kidnapped, tortured and killed by State agents, who also abandoned the abused bodies in the open. The court therefore determined that "the treatment given to the remains of the victims, which were sacred to their relatives and, in particular, to their mothers, constituted cruel and inhuman treatment for them. The Inter-American Court cites in the decision its own precedent of the Blake Case (Judgment of January 24, 1998, para. 115) and other decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and the United Nations Human Rights Committee.

149. In relation to the victims' family members, the Inter-American Court has established that the persons closest to the victim may also be considered victims in cases in which fundamental rights such as life and personal integrity are violated. Among the elements that must be taken into account to determine the concept of victim, the Court relates the proximity of the family relationship, the particular circumstances of the relationship with the victim, the degree to which the relative witnessed the events related to the disappearance, the degree of participation of the relative in the search for the disappeared person and the response of the State to the efforts made¹²⁸.

In the case of attacks on men, the objective seems to have them disappear, and so men are more often victims of homicide and forced disappearance. internal armed conflict, they are also the bearers of initiatives of inclusion, democratization and authentic peacemaking for the Colombian State and society.

B. GENDER AND NON-DISCRIMINATION

57. This second section addresses the standards developed by the Commission in order to account for the interrelationship between this principle and the gender perspective, considering the particular situation of women and LGBTI persons. In transitional justice contexts, the principle of equality and non-discrimination acquires crucial importance, as its scope reflects the indivisible and interdependent nature of human rights, thus constituting one of the fundamental pillars of any democratic system.
58. The IACHR has recognized that the structural nature of gender-based discrimination, underlying all forms of violence against women and LGBTI persons, requires the cross-cutting incorporation of a gender perspective in its analysis and approach¹³¹ , which necessarily entails its application in transitional justice contexts, taking into account the particular forms of victimization that result from structural and historical discrimination.
59. In this same context, the IACHR has stressed that States have the right and responsibility to promote policies and implement programs that promote the reconciliation of their peoples¹³² . However, in designing such frameworks, the Commission has pointed out that in order for States to comply with their international obligations, they must consider and incorporate differentiated perspectives such as gender and diversity, based on the principle of equality and non-discrimination.

¹³¹ IACHR, Press Release No. 198/21 "The IACHR calls on the States of the region to apply the gender approach as a tool to combat structural discrimination against women and LGBTI persons", July 29, 2021.

¹³² IACHR, Right to the Truth in the Americas, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.152. Doc. 2. 13 August 2014.para. 83.

1. The principle of equality and nondiscrimination and the indivisible and interdependent nature of human rights

60. The principle of equality is one of the guiding principles of international human rights law. The right to be treated with equal consideration and respect, to be free from discriminatory treatment and to have the State promote the conditions for equality to be real and effective, occupies a central place in the entire international corpus iuris since it is a necessary presupposition for the effective and universal enjoyment of the other human rights¹³³. This principle has a dual nature: it is a guiding principle and a fundamental right.
61. In the context of the IAHRs, Article 1.1 of the Convention¹³⁴ is considered a general rule whose scope covers all the provisions of the treaty. This article establishes the obligation of the States Parties to respect and guarantee the full and free exercise of the rights and freedoms recognized in the Convention without discrimination of any kind. Article 24 establishes the principle of equal protection of the law and prohibits discrimination, and is applicable to the entire legal system of the States Parties.
62. The IAHRs has recognized that discrimination is a serious human rights problem with negative repercussions for women and the community around them, and constitutes an impediment to the recognition and enjoyment of all their human rights. It also recognizes the existence of a close link between the problem of discrimination against women and the problem of violence that affects them. In this context, the IACHR has asserted the State's responsibility to act with due diligence to prevent the undermining of women's human rights in times of peace and conflict¹³⁵. The Commission has also urged States to adopt legal frameworks that protect people from discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity and bodily diversity. In this regard, it should be noted that both the Commission and the I/A Court H.R. have interpreted sexual orientation and gender identity as protected by the phrase "other status" in Article 1(1) of the American Convention¹³⁶ .

63. When addressing the gender perspective in transitional justice, it is crucial to recognize that guaranteeing formal and material equality implies confronting structural and historical inequalities. Material equality becomes important when considering affirmative measures to counteract the specific vulnerabilities of women and LGBTI persons, contributing to a transitional justice that addresses intersectional impacts through mechanisms of memory, truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of non-repetition.

220. Accordingly, the inherent link between discrimination and violence against women is relevant to the scope of the duty of protection of a State with respect to the activities of women human rights defenders, and entails special obligations of prevention for the same. When a State does not adopt reasonable measures to prevent acts of violence against women human rights defenders, or remedy a known context of discrimination that promotes the repetition of these acts, not only does it violate the right to humane treatment, but also its obligation not to discriminate against women, contained in Article 1(1) of the American Convention¹³⁸.

614. The IACHR has established that the principle of non-discrimination is one of the pillars of any democratic system and a fundamental principle of the system created by the OAS to protect human rights.¹³⁹ Even so, as this report illustrates, Colombia's internal armed conflict provoked and perpetuates certain problems for specific groups that are particularly vulnerable and/or suffer discrimination on multiple levels[...].

982. In this respect, the IACHR notes the importance of the right to freedom of expression and to the diversity of opinions so as to guarantee a pluralist debate, which is necessary in a democratic society.¹⁴⁰ Nonetheless, the IACHR considers it important to take into account the State's obligation to prevent and respond to discrimination, as well as the context of discrimination and violence in Colombia in relation to LGBTI persons. Accordingly, the violence and discrimination against LGBTI persons in Colombia – exacerbated by the internal armed conflict – are aggravated by such pronouncements that endorse, in the public discourse and in the social mindset, the denial of the right to equality and non-discrimination based on the sexual orientation and gender identity of LGBTI persons. The IACHR reminds the Colombian State that it has the duty to respect and ensure the human rights of persons without any discrimination whatsoever based on sexual orientation or gender identity, categories that are protected by the American Convention on Human Rights in Article 1(1)¹⁴¹.

390. In its report Honduras: Human Rights and Coup d'Etat, the Commission noted the deepening discrimination against lesbians, gays, and trans, bisexual and intersex persons, and expressed deep concern about the degree of violence, discrimination and exclusion against these persons and urged the elimination of impunity for the acts perpetrated against them.

2. Structural discrimination

64. Structural discrimination responds to the set of norms, rules, routines, patterns, attitudes and patterns of behavior, both de jure and de facto, that give way to a situation of inferiority and exclusion against a group of people in a generalized manner, which are perpetuated over time and even for generations, that is, it is not isolated, sporadic or episodic cases, but rather discrimination that arises as a result of a historical, socioeconomic and cultural context¹⁴². In this sense, structural discrimination in the jurisprudence of the IACHR has allowed for a disaggregated and broad analysis of the historical, temporal and geographical context in cases where patterns of discrimination are present.¹⁴³
65. Historical and structural discrimination against women and LGBTI persons is materialized in regulatory frameworks, public policies and social practices that reproduce gender roles and stereotypes. In this sense, the IACHR has recognized that the gender perspective is a key tool for combating discrimination and violence against women and LGBTI persons, as it seeks to make visible the position of inequality and structural subordination of women because of their gender in the context of the hetero-cis-patriarchal system predominant in the region.¹⁴⁴

66. When identifying the existence of a situation of structural discrimination, the Commission has understood that the State must adopt appropriate measures to reduce and eliminate the situation of disadvantage or exclusion experienced by a person or group of persons¹⁴⁵. In this context, the IACHR has highlighted the intimate relationship between gender-based structural discrimination and violence against women, urging States to adopt practical, effective and comprehensive actions to modify the discriminatory socio-cultural patterns that underlie gender-based violence against women and to redouble efforts to combat the impunity that surrounds these cases¹⁴⁶. In the case of transitional justice contexts, the IACHR has emphasized the situation of structural discrimination against women human rights defenders, journalists, indigenous women, Afro-descendant and trans women.

investigation¹⁴⁷. States have a reinforced duty to combat generalized violence and impunity. In light of that, the IACHR considers that in such cases the duty of due diligence should be especially rigorously applied, given the historical and entrenched discrimination that this group has suffered¹⁴⁸, and which is also closely connected with the violence that affects them in particular¹⁴⁹.

IACHR, Report No. 150/18, Case 12.954. Merits. Jineth Bedoya Lima et al. Colombia, December 7, 2018.

98. The Commission finds that the sexual violence suffered by Jineth Bedoya is part of the widespread context of sexual violence against women that characterized the Colombian armed conflict and exemplifies the special risks of sexual violence and discrimination to which women journalists are exposed in the practice of their profession because of their gender. The IACHR considers that the State failed in its duty, insofar as the national authorities failed to act to protect the journalist from this type of violence, which constitutes a violation of Articles 5.1, 5.2, 11, and 24 of the American Convention, in relation to the obligations contained in Article 1.1 thereof, Article 7b of the Convention of Belém do Pará, and Articles 1 and 6 of the IACPPT.

219. In this sense, the State's duty to prevent and protect takes on special meaning in the case of women human rights defenders. In addition to the risk inherent to the work of human rights defense is the history of discrimination that women have suffered based on their sex, stemming from stereotyped concepts and sociocultural patterns of behavior that have promoted their treatment as inferiors¹⁵⁰. This history of discrimination has increasingly exposed them, in certain contexts, to acts of violence, threats, harassment, and other types of violations of their human rights¹⁵¹. The IACHR has established how women human rights defenders continue in several countries of the hemisphere, including Colombia, being exposed to a special situation of risk of suffering human rights violations compared to other groups of defenders¹⁵².

77. In Colombia, LGBTI human rights defenders have constantly been victims of violence and structural discrimination in the context of the armed conflict. During its visit, the Commission was informed about the heightened risk faced by LGBTI human rights defenders, with a significant increase in the number of killings and threats. Civil society organizations noted that this is due to the double risk they face, based both on their efforts to defend people who have historically been discriminated against and on prejudice against their sexual orientation or gender identity, as well as the lack of differentiated prevention and protection measures and guarantees to defend the rights of this population¹⁵³.

IACHR, Indigenous Women and Their Human Rights in the Americas, OEA/Ser.L/V/III. Doc. 44/17, April 17, 2017.

7. This political, social, and economic marginalization of indigenous women contributes to a continuous situation of structural discrimination and makes them particularly susceptible to a variety of acts of violence prohibited by the Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Eradication and Punishment of Violence against Women (hereinafter, “Convention of Belém do Pará”) and other Inter-American instruments. This marginalization and vulnerability of indigenous women is enhanced when States fail to produce comprehensive and disaggregated statistics, and do not properly document the differentiated forms of violence that affect indigenous women¹⁵⁴ . Indigenous women are more likely to suffer acts of physical, psychological, and sexual violence within specific contexts. Violence against indigenous women is a fixture during armed conflicts, during the execution of major development, investment, and extractive projects, the militarization of indigenous lands, and in the context of their work as human rights defenders. Most of these acts are met by no response or a deficient response by State authorities, enabling the path for impunity. Indigenous women also face specific obstacles in attempting to obtain safe, adequate, effective, and culturally appropriate access to justice when their human rights are violated¹⁵⁵ . Most justice systems throughout the hemisphere still lack a gender and ethno-racial perspective in their processing of individual cases, reflected in the scarcity of interpreters, translators, and legal personnel trained and sensitive to the culture and worldview of indigenous peoples.

23. The IACHR recognizes that many of the human rights issues in the country are structural and have remained unsolved since the armed conflict, namely: the levels of violence that affect the Salvadoran society; the impact of hard-handed citizen security policies on the human rights of the population; access to justice, truth and memory of the victims of the armed conflict; the precarious situation of the population deprived of liberty; the relationship between high levels of internal displacement and international migration and structural situations of poverty, inequality and violence; the prevalence of misogynist, sexist and discriminatory social and cultural patterns that impact the right of women and LGBTI people to live free from violence and discrimination [...].

39. The concept of structural discrimination has been highlighted by the IACHR with particular emphasis on the need to undertake a broad appraisal of the historical, temporal, and geographic context in cases where patterns of discrimination appear.

40. In this regard, when verifying whether or not there is a situation of structural discrimination, the Commission understands that the State must take suitable measures to reduce and eliminate the situation of inferiority or exclusion against a given person or group of persons [...].

3. Indirect discrimination

67. The IACHR has established that the review of norms and policies on the basis of the principle of effective equality and non-discrimination also covers the possible discriminatory impact of these measures, even when they appear neutral in their formulation, or are measures of a general and undifferentiated scope¹⁵⁶.

68. In this regard, it should be noted that the Convention of Belém do Pará imposes on States the obligation to adopt all appropriate measures, including legislative measures, to modify or abolish existing laws and regulations or to modify legal or customary practices that support the persistence or tolerance of discrimination and violence against women. The Commission has established that States have the duty to review norms, practices, and public policies that discriminate or whose effect may be discriminatory to the detriment of women, which should be extended to LGBTI persons.

I/A Court H.R.

*I/A Court H.R., Case of the "Mapiripán Massacre" v. Colombia.
Judgment of September 15, 2005. Series C No. 134*

177. In view of the complexity of the phenomenon of internal displacement and of the broad range of human rights affected or endangered by it, and bearing in mind said circumstances of special weakness, vulnerability, and defenselessness in which the displaced population generally finds itself, as subjects of human rights, their situation can be understood as an individual de facto situation of lack of protection with regard to the rest of those who are in similar situations. This condition of vulnerability has a social dimension, in the specific historical context of the domestic armed conflict in Colombia, and it leads to the establishment of differences in access of displaced persons to public resources managed by the State. Said condition is reproduced by cultural prejudices that hinder the integration of the displaced population in society and that can lead to impunity regarding the human rights violations against them.

178. With regard to this situation of inequality, it is pertinent to recall that there is an unbreakable tie between the erga omnes obligations to respect and guarantee human rights and the principle of equality and non-discrimination, which has the nature of jus cogens and is crucial to safeguard human rights both under international law and under domestic venue, and which impregnates all actions by State power, in all its expressions. To comply with said obligations, States must abstain from carrying out actions that in any way, directly or indirectly, create situations of de jure or de facto discrimination, and they must also take positive steps to revert or change existing discriminatory situations in their societies, to the detriment of a given group of persons. This entails the special duty of protection that the State must provide in connection with actions and practices of third parties who, under its tolerance or acquiescence, create, maintain or foster discriminatory situations¹⁵⁷ .

Merits Reports

IACHR. Report No. 64/11. Case 12.573. Merits. Marino López et al. \(Operation Genesis\). Colombia. March 31, 2011.

370. With respect to displaced persons, the Inter-American Court has established that to comply with the obligation of non-discrimination, the States must refrain from taking action that in any way is designed directly or indirectly to create situations of discrimination de jure or de facto, as well as to adopt positive measures to reverse or change current discriminatory situations in their countries. This implies a special duty of protection on the part of the State with respect to the actions and practices of third parties which, through tolerance or acquiescence, create, perpetuate or favor discriminatory situations¹⁵⁸ , and that the differentiated situation the displaced persons are in requires the States to grant special treatment in their favor and to adopt measures of a positive character to reverse the effects of their said condition of weakness, vulnerability and defenselessness, including vis-à-vis the actions and practices of individual third parties.

4. Violence, discrimination and access to justice

69. The IASHR is based on the premise that access to appropriate and effective judicial remedies is the first line of defense of basic rights, including the rights of women in cases of violence. In the Americas, the binding principles of equality and non-discrimination represent the backbone of the inter-American human rights system and are reflected in binding instruments such as the American Convention, the American Declaration and the Convention of Belém do Pará. These instruments affirm the right of women to have access to a simple and effective judicial remedy with due guarantees when they report acts of violence, as well as the obligation of States to act with due diligence to prevent, investigate, punish and redress these acts¹⁵⁹.
70. The Commission has recognized the duty of States to act with due diligence in the face of human rights violations. In cases of gender-based violence, the Convention of Belém do Pará highlights the special connotation of the obligation to act with due diligence due to the seriousness of violence against women in the region, as well as the need for comprehensive strategies to prevent, punish and eradicate it. It is worth mentioning that the I/A Court H.R. has extended the protection of the Convention of Belém do Pará to trans persons, considering that violence against them, based on their gender identity or expression, is also based on gender as a social construction of the identities, functions and attributes socially assigned to women and men¹⁶⁰.
71. In this context, the IACHR has urged States to implement measures that comply with the duty to act with due diligence to prevent, punish and eradicate violence and discrimination against women and LGBTI persons, recognizing the link between gender discrimination and violence. In substantive reports, the IACHR has analyzed specific cases, such as the Rio Negro and El Mozote massacres, highlighting the importance of investigating acts of sexual violence and applying a gender perspective in judicial proceedings. In addition, the Commission has insisted on the need for a comprehensive response in cases of gender-based violence, including protection measures, timely trial and effective access to legal proceedings.

133. Based on the above and on an evolutive interpretation¹⁶¹, the Court considers that, in the sphere of application of the Inter-American Convention for the Prevention, Punishment and Eradication of Violence against Women, there is also a reference to situations of genderbased violence against trans women, as in this case.

134. In addition, the Court recalls that, when applying the said treaty, it has developed the notion of enhanced due diligence¹⁶². This signifies applying a gender perspective in the investigation and prosecution of cases of violence against women, including violence against trans women, as well as avoiding chronic impunity that sends a message of tolerance and permits a repetition of the facts. The purpose of the treaty is to achieve the eradication of this phenomenon which is structurally rooted in our societies.

66. [...] the Commission has affirmed that an armed conflict reproduces and increases discrimination, and "although men are frequently victims of summary executions and massacres, violence against women, particularly violence perpetrated by armed groups, has become habitual in the midst of a conflict [...]"¹⁶³. In this sense, in the present case, dealing with the disappearance of Patricia Emilie Cuéllar and Julia Orbelina Pérez, the IACHR considers that taking into account that the disappearance in this context has a differentiated impact given the particular risk of being a victim of sexual violence, the State has a reinforced duty of due diligence, due to the particular situation of vulnerability that women face in this type of practice. As noted, the authorities have not carried out any investigation to ascertain the truth of the facts or their possible differential impact on the women victims, and the possibility that they were framed in the context of particular affectations of women in the Salvadoran armed conflict. To this end, the Commission notes the importance of the State investigating a possible context that describes the possible violence to which women may have been subjected in the context of the armed conflict and adopting a gender perspective in the investigation of the facts that have yet to be addressed. The Commission highlights what was expressed by El Salvador. Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances which points out that "the adoption of a gender perspective

111. Once they become aware of acts of gender-based sexual violence against women journalists, States must investigate these acts, identify, prosecute, and punish the perpetrators, and provide comprehensive reparation to the victims. This obligation arises from Articles 5, 13, 8, and 25 of the ACHR, within the framework of the general obligation to guarantee rights established in Article 1.1 thereof. This obligation to investigate complaints of sexual violence is provided for in Articles 1, 6, and 8 of the InterAmerican Convention against Torture, which require the State “to take effective measures to prevent and punish torture within their jurisdiction,” and also “to prevent and punish other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.”¹⁶⁵ . It is further reinforced by Article 7 of the Convention of Belém do Pará, which obligates the State to exercise due diligence and enact the necessary regulatory framework to investigate and punish violence against women.¹⁶⁶ . Article 7(b) of the Convention specifically requires States parties to act with due diligence to prevent, punish, and eradicate violence against women. This duty is activated from the moment the

113. In this context, the Commission has pointed out that States must have an adequate legal framework of protection, effective means for its implementation, and prevention policies and practices that allow them to respond effectively to complaints of sexual violence¹⁶⁸ . The Inter-American Court emphasized that, in cases of sexual violence, the investigation should try, whenever possible, to avoid re-victimization or the reliving of the profound traumatic experience each time the victim remembers or testifies about what happened¹⁶⁹ .

117. Impunity for such crimes sends the message that violence against women is tolerated, which encourages its perpetuation and social acceptance, fosters a sense and feeling of insecurity in women, and contributes to their continued distrust of the justice system¹⁷⁰ .

[...] The IACHR has stated that judicial ineffectiveness in cases of violence against women creates a climate of impunity that is conducive to violence “since society sees no evidence of willingness by the State, as the representative of the society, to take effective action to sanction such acts.¹⁷³” The IACHR has further noted that the obstacles such women face in securing access to suitable and effective judicial remedies to redress the violations they suffer can be even more daunting in that they suffer from a combination of various forms of discrimination: as women, because of their ethnic or racial origin, and/or by virtue of their socio-economic status¹⁷⁴.

In addition, it took many years after the massacres for an investigation to begin - approximately 12 years - and when it did begin, there were no adequate and sustainable methods for exhuming the remains of the victims and conducting forensic examinations on these issues. Against this backdrop, the Commission considers that, in these circumstances, the statements collected by the Legal Guardianship Office of the Archbishopric constitute evidence, uncontested by the State through serious and diligent investigations, that an undetermined group of women were sexually violated in the El Mozote hamlet on December 11, 1981, prior to their extrajudicial execution.

7. [...] This marginalization and vulnerability of indigenous women is enhanced when States fail to produce comprehensive and disaggregated statistics, and do not properly document the differentiated forms of violence that affect indigenous women¹⁷⁷ . Indigenous women are more likely to suffer acts of physical, psychological, and sexual violence within specific contexts. Violence against indigenous women is a fixture during armed conflicts, during the execution of major development, investment, and extractive projects, the militarization of indigenous lands, and in the context of their work as human rights defenders. Most of these acts are met by no response or a deficient response by State authorities, enabling the path for impunity. Indigenous women also face specific obstacles in attempting to obtain safe, adequate, effective, and culturally appropriate access to justice when their human rights are violated. Most justice systems throughout the hemisphere still lack a gender and ethno-racial perspective in their processing of individual cases, reflected in the scarcity of interpreters, translators, and legal personnel trained and sensitive to the culture and worldview of indigenous peoples.

The IACHR observes that lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans and intersex persons have historically been subject to discrimination and violence based on their sexual orientation and gender identity in Colombia; this situation was exacerbated by the armed conflict, as manifested primarily in two aspects: acts of violence (assassinations, attacks, and threats) by armed groups, who turn them into military targets, and forced displacement. This situation of discrimination and violence is aggravated by a social and political context in which there is a highly politicized dispute over the recognition of certain rights of LGBTI persons. In addition, the IACHR observes that while there have been gains in state measures to prevent and punish violence against these persons, they have not been effective. Accordingly, one observes that the situation of violence is generalized throughout the country and focused on gay men, trans women, lesbian women, as well as activists and defenders of the human rights of LGBTI persons.

1030. Based on the considerations in this chapter, the IACHR makes the following recommendations to the Colombian State: 1. Adopt the necessary measures to ensure that the rights of LGBTI persons to equality and non-discrimination are respected by the various State authorities and offices. 2. Design and adopt the measures necessary to prevent acts of violence and discrimination against lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, and intersex persons, to protect them from these abuses, and to act with due diligence when responding to these acts, whether committed by state agents, third persons, or armed groups, throughout the national territory. 3. Adopt the state measures necessary to ensure that effective investigations are undertaken in cases of assassinations and acts of violence against LGBTI persons, including the lines of investigation that make it possible to consider whether they were committed based on the real or perceived sexual orientation, gender identity, or gender expression of the victims. To strengthen the capacity of authorities in charge of investigating and responding to cases of discrimination and violence against LGBTI persons.

67. The IACHR has pronounced over the state's responsibility to act with due diligence to prevent violations of women's human rights during times of peace and times of conflict. It has noted numerous obstacles of a legislative, institutional, cultural, and geographical nature that impede access to effective justice¹⁷⁸. They include: Deficiencies in the investigation, judgment and sanction of acts of violence and discrimination, which result in a mistrust of the administration of justice; gaps in systems to gather statistics; and the dearth of human and financial resources to address the persisting problems. Furthermore, it is necessary to establish sustainable capacity- building programs for justice officials and to begin programs to sensitize the population and to promote an increase in the submission of complaints. Lastly, the report recognizes weaknesses of the administration of justice in the zones occupied by the armed actors, and the implementation of principles and practices within the penal procedures applicable to violence against women that can challenge women's access to effective judicial protections and guarantee¹⁷⁹.

Indeed, the search, investigation process and the arduous journey that family members and relatives, especially women, must embark on to defend their rights expose them to a series of adverse social and economic effects, as well as the risk of violence, including sexual violence, forced displacement, disappearance, persecution, and reprisals as a result of their efforts to locate their loved ones. Some of these threats and violence are enacted with the aim of silencing the voices of family members and interrupting the search and investigation. They also function as retaliation for having confronted the perpetrators by defending the victims' rights. These circumstances are compounded by discriminatory practices around access to truth, justice, and reparation such as those experienced by women and LGBTIQ+ persons, who face barriers when filing complaints of enforced disappearance and experience practices that entail revictimization on the part of State institutions. Groups of family members searching for their missing loved ones and civil society organizations have also spoken out against the lack of information and communication with families who wish to take part in search and investigation processes and the fact that they are often not permitted do so.

III. COMPREHENSIVE REPARATION IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE CONTEXTS

72. This chapter addresses the main standards developed by the IACHR on reparations in transitional justice contexts, in which societies seek ways to respond to the legacy of gross and systematic human rights violations that occurred in the context of internal armed conflicts, dictatorships, and oppressive and authoritarian regimes of the past. First, some general considerations are made regarding the evolution of the concept of reparation in International Human Rights Law (hereinafter "IHRL"), and some particularities of reparation measures in transitional processes are highlighted. Subsequently, the standards developed by the IACHR in this area in the framework of its different mandates are systematized, following for methodological purposes the following classification: (i) restitution measures; (ii) satisfaction measures; (iii) rehabilitation measures; (iv) justice measures; and (vi) measures of non-repetition. As noted in the previous chapter, this systematization is not exhaustive, but rather seeks to reflect those aspects that the IACHR has highlighted the most, trying as far as possible to maintain a balance between the different mandates and countries.

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

73. The notion of reparation in IHRL arises from a basic principle of public international law. In the existence of international responsibility of a State generated by its action or omission, two international obligations arise: to make the violation cease, and to make reparation for the damage caused. This notion of reparation has been the result of an evolutionary process in public international law and then in international human rights law that culminated in the recognition of the principle of reparation as an obligation of States, the purpose of which is to remedy the damage caused to individuals by the violation of their human rights¹⁸¹.

74. The first precedent of reparation in public international law dates back to the Chorzow Factory case decided by the Permanent Court of Justice in 1928. In this case, Poland was ordered to pay compensation to Germany for damages caused to two joint stock companies, resulting from the expropriation of a factory¹⁸². This principle of reparation was later incorporated into the field of IHRL on the understanding that individuals are rights holders and are therefore affected by the breach of international norms of respect and guarantee of human rights, for which reason they must be compensated¹⁸³.
75. The adoption and development of legal principles and rules on reparations for human rights violations has been one of the main contemporary advances of IHRL. In particular, the decisions adopted by the IASHR have played a fundamental role in this process. In this regard, through its various mechanisms, the IACHR has developed guidelines applicable to comprehensive reparation in order to fully guarantee the right of victims to have the damages suffered as a result of human rights violations remedied.
76. According to Inter-American jurisprudence, reparation of the damage caused by the breach of an international obligation requires - whenever possible - full restitution (restitutio in integrum), which consists of the reestablishment of the previous situation. In cases where this is not possible, which is the most frequent, a series of measures must be determined to repair the consequences of the violation and to establish the payment of economic reparation as compensation for the damage caused¹⁸⁴.

77. In contexts of transitional justice -through which societies seek ways to respond to the legacy of gross and systematic human rights violations- comprehensive reparation also becomes a fundamental pillar in the transitional process, together with the pillars of memory, truth, justice and non-repetition¹⁸⁵. This pillar, in turn, dialogues especially with the different components of comprehensive reparation, in particular with the measures of satisfaction, justice and guarantees of non-repetition.

1. Reparations in transitional contexts

78. The IACHR has reiterated on several occasions that reparations are a fundamental element in transitional justice processes. In particular, it has developed the scope that such reparations should have, pointing out some particular characteristics such as: (i) the obligation to make reparations arises not only with respect to breaches of international criminal law but also with respect to any serious violation of human rights¹⁸⁶; (ii) reparations take place with respect to violations by action or omission of State agents as well as with respect to damages caused by illegal armed groups¹⁸⁷; (iii) reparation must take the form of individual measures, measures of general scope and guarantees of non-repetition¹⁸⁸; (iv) reparation cannot be confused with humanitarian aid¹⁸⁹; and (v) access to reparations must be guaranteed through an effective judicial remedy for the victims and their family members, expressly offered by the State¹⁹⁰.

79. Similarly, the IACHR has referred to certain specificities in the design and implementation of reparation measures in transitional contexts. In particular, such design and implementation must be differential, preferential, comprehensive and through specialized institutions and personnel¹⁹¹. It should also take into consideration the expectations and participation of the victims and their families¹⁹², as well as other relevant actors -such as civil society¹⁹³. Such participation does not imply, however, that the search for just compensation rests exclusively on the procedural initiative or private contribution of evidence by the victims¹⁹⁴. It is the State that should have a central role and primary

165. International human rights law has recognized different rights of individuals as victims of unlawful acts, including those related to reparation measures¹⁹⁹. In this sense, States must recognize the right of victims to obtain appropriate reparation for such violations and expressly offer victims of human rights violations an effective judicial remedy to access it [...]. Likewise, the State has the unavoidable duty to make reparations for those human rights violations for which it is responsible²⁰⁰. In this regard, the organs of the Inter-American System have historically pointed out that, by virtue of the provisions of Article 63(1) of the ACHR, any violation of an international obligation that has caused damages entails the duty to make adequate reparation to each victim.

167. Specifically in transitional contexts, the jurisprudence of the Inter-American System has established on several occasions that the victims of serious human rights violations have the right to adequate reparation for the harm suffered, which must take the form of individual measures aimed at restitution, compensation, and rehabilitation of the victim or his or her family members, as well as measures of satisfaction of particular or general scope and guarantees of non-repetition [...] ²⁰¹.

169. Likewise, the Commission has held that the principle that should guide the implementation of reparations for human rights violations is that of effectiveness, both in the sense of achieving full compliance with the measure, as well as taking due account of the needs of the beneficiaries. The Commission considers that the design and execution of reparation measures must be differential, preferential, comprehensive, through specialized institutions and personnel, and taking into consideration the expectations and participation of the victims in their implementation. Likewise, the IACHR has indicated that serious human rights violations and breaches of IHL entitle victims to reparation, and that this cannot be confused with humanitarian aid or the satisfaction of other needs.

The IACHR [...] has reiterated that the jurisprudence of the Inter-American System has established on various occasions that the victims of serious violations perpetrated during the armed conflict have the right to adequate reparation for the harm suffered, which must be made concrete through individual measures aimed at restitution, compensation and rehabilitation of the victim, as well as general measures of satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition²⁰². The Inter-American Court of Human Rights has established that "in cases of human rights violations, the duty to make reparations is the State's own, and therefore, although the victims or their family members must have ample opportunities to seek just compensation under domestic law, this duty cannot rest exclusively on their procedural initiative or on the private provision of evidence"²⁰³. Reparations must consist of measures aimed at eliminating the effects of the violations committed, and their nature and amount will depend on the material and non-material damage caused. Reparations cannot imply either enrichment or impoverishment for the victim or his or her successors²⁰⁴.

2. The IACHR understands that beyond the established legal system, the State has a central role and a primary responsibility in guaranteeing victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law²⁰⁵ an effective and equal access to reparation measures, in accordance with the standards of international human rights law. In no way can the victims' access to reparation be subject exclusively to the determination of criminal responsibility of the perpetrators, nor to the prior execution of their personal assets, legal or illegal²⁰⁶.

2. Right to integral reparation and strengthening of peace

80. One of the aspects that transitional processes often face is the alleged tension between peace and justice. In this regard, the Commission has considered that what exists between the two is an interdependence and not a clash of values. In this sense, it has pointed out on several occasions that the durability of peace is linked to the non-repetition of serious human rights violations and therefore to the reparation of the consequences of violence²⁰⁷. Far from hindering peace, such reparations are a basic pillar of its strength, since peacebuilding is inextricably linked to the investigation, prosecution and reparation of human rights violations²⁰⁸. Thus, for the IACHR, overcoming impunity is an indispensable element for achieving justice and avoiding the repetition of the events that gave rise to the violations²⁰⁹. Likewise, in cases of internal armed conflicts, the Commission has emphasized the need to employ effective negotiation mechanisms to deactivate the actors in the conflict and put an end to the violence²¹⁰.

13. In this framework ("Legal Framework for Peace"), the Commission reiterated, first, that overcoming impunity is an indispensable element for achieving justice and avoiding the repetition of human rights violations. Secondly, in any transitional justice framework, a component for the establishment of a lasting peace is that it be applied as a system of useful incentives for truth, justice and reparations for victims, and that in the design of normative mechanisms, the international obligations of the State to guarantee these components must be fully observed in their application and scope. Third, the Commission reiterated to the State that it is essential that the peace agreements and the transitional justice provisions that pave the way for the transition of Colombian society towards a stable and lasting peace be developed in harmony with these obligations and offer real possibilities for compliance.

IACHR, Pronouncement of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights on the application and scope of the Justice and Peace Law in Colombia, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.12, August 1, 2006.

1. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) has on numerous occasions emphasized the need to employ effective negotiation mechanisms in order to deactivate the actors in the armed conflict and put an end to the violence that has affected the inhabitants of the Republic of Colombia for the past four decades. The Commission has also pointed out that the durability of peace is linked to the non-repetition of crimes under international law, human rights violations and serious breaches of international humanitarian law and, therefore, to the clarification and reparation of the consequences of the violence through mechanisms capable of establishing the truth of what happened, administering justice and making reparations to the victims of the conflict.

3. Transformative vocation and differentiated, intersectional approaches

81. In situations of discrimination and structural violence, the IACHR has pointed out that reparation measures that are only restitutive in nature are considered insufficient, given that they would be restoring the victims and affected communities to the situation that gave rise to the human rights violations of which they were victims. In order to correct the situation of discrimination and marginalization, corrective measures must be adopted that have a transformative vocation²¹². In this sense, the IACHR has indicated that "a merely restorative approach to reparations does not address structural factors and, therefore, does not guarantee that human rights violations will not recur²¹³".

82. In contexts of transitional justice, the IACHR considers that in order for there to be an effective transition to a democratic regime and the rule of law, States must adopt a public policy of reparation with particular emphasis on measures of a transformative nature that correct the root causes of the conflict, as well as the situation of discrimination and exclusion that caused certain groups to suffer differentiated and disproportionate impacts under dictatorships and oppressive and authoritarian regimes. In such contexts, the Commission has pronounced in particular on the transformative vocation of reparation, and has referred that it is inadmissible that a reparation seeks "a restitution to the same structural situation of violence and discrimination²¹⁴".

83. As will be presented below -through its various mechanisms- the IACHR has reiterated the differentiated and disproportionate impact that armed conflicts and other contexts of serious violations have on certain groups that have historically suffered structural discrimination and exclusion. This places these populations in situations of greater violence and causes them greater difficulties in exercising and enjoying their rights. In these contexts, the IACHR has analyzed the situation of, among others, women, LGBTI persons, children and adolescents, indigenous peoples, Afro-descendants, human rights defenders, the elderly and persons with disabilities.

84. Likewise, the already existing situation of discrimination and violence against these populations is aggravated and deepened in the face of additional factors of discrimination²¹⁵. Among other situations, the Commission has addressed: (i) the special risk faced by these populations in cases of forced displacement²¹⁶ ; (ii) the greater vulnerability of Afro-descendant or indigenous children and adolescents in contexts of violence as victims of other indirect consequences of the conflict²¹⁷ ; (iii) the special violence against Afro-descendant LGBT persons²¹⁸ , and (iv) the additional forms of discrimination and greater exposure to violence faced by defenders who represent an indigenous or Afro-descendant leadership²¹⁹ .
85. In this regard, the IACHR has emphasized the obligation of States to take into account differentiated and intersectional reparation criteria with respect to these groups. According to the IACHR, a differentiated approach implies considering the particular conditions of vulnerability and the factors that may increase the risk of acts of violence and discrimination in certain contexts, such as race, ethnicity, age, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, and disability. Likewise, the IACHR has highlighted the importance of taking into account the frequent intersectionality of these factors, which, as indicated above, can accentuate this situation of risk²²⁰. In transitional justice contexts, the IACHR has also called for the application of differentiated and intersectional treatment²²¹.

The Commission observes that because of the particular characteristics of these groups and the historical discrimination and exclusion they have suffered, forced displacement leaves these groups in a particularly vulnerable situation.

IACHR, Principal Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131, Doc. 1, February 19, 2008.

13. The IACHR has indicated that it is essential that the State respect the rights of groups at greater risk of human rights violations -such as women, children, indigenous peoples, Afro-Colombian communities, social leaders and human rights defenders²²⁴ in the clarification and punishment of the acts of violence and discrimination that have occurred, as well as the right to adequate reparation for the harm caused, through individual measures of restitution, compensation and rehabilitation²²⁵ [...].

15. Regarding the reparation of victims of other groups exposed to greater risk of human rights violations, such as indigenous peoples and Afro-descendant communities, the State should also take into account differentiated reparation criteria that include recognition and respect for their identity and culture, recognition and respect for their territories, and the participation of their authorities in all decisions that affect them²²⁶. In this sense, the importance of including their traditional authorities in the consultation process is reiterated.

17. Likewise, the IACHR considers that it is important that the administrative reparations program take into account reparation criteria for victims displaced as a result of the violent actions of illegal armed groups²²⁷. In this regard, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights has established that due to the complexity of the phenomenon of internal displacement and the wide range of human rights it affects or puts at risk, and in view of the circumstances of special vulnerability and defenselessness in which displaced persons generally find themselves, their situation can be understood as a de facto condition of unprotection. Under the terms of the American Convention, this situation obliges States to grant preferential treatment in their favor and to adopt positive measures to reverse the effects of their condition of weakness, vulnerability and defenselessness²²⁸.

4. Participation of victims, family members and society in general

86. On numerous occasions, the IACHR has reiterated the need for the State, in transitional contexts, to provide opportunities for victims to participate in decisions regarding the design and implementation of reparation mechanisms and policies²²⁹. Among other aspects, this participation: (i) allows the needs of the affected persons and communities to be known, (ii) constitutes a prerequisite for the legitimacy of the measures adopted, (iii) guarantees their effectiveness, and (iv) recovers the confidence of the citizenry in State institutions, one of the main objectives of transitional justice mechanisms²³⁰. The IACHR has also stressed that the implementation of reparations must be accompanied by a commitment to social solidarity with the victims²³¹.

87. On the other hand, the IACHR has indicated what such participation should look like. The IACHR has reiterated the need to ensure that the voice, concerns and priorities of women are integrated into the public agenda in order to achieve the development and maintenance of an institutional and political environment that makes it possible to assess the general and specific risks of the various forms of gender-based violence and contribute to reducing them. In this regard, it has emphasized that it is not enough to create mechanisms for consultation and deliberation, but that participation must be effective, for which purpose the contributions emanating from these mechanisms must be incorporated into the public reparations policies adopted²³². In addition, reparations must be the result of an open and transparent process of dialogue and prior consultation with civil society, which allows for legitimizing and guaranteeing the continuity, irreversibility, and institutionalization of public reparations policies²³³. In other words, opportunities must be provided for full and active participation in the elaboration, planning, and execution of initiatives, programs, laws, and policies that are aimed at or have an impact on the prevention, investigation, punishment, and reparation of acts of violence and discrimination perpetrated against the affected persons and communities.

IACHR, Principal Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131, Doc. 1, February 19, 2008.

4. The administrative reparations program to be implemented by the State must necessarily reflect the result of an open and transparent process of dialogue and prior consultation with civil society and the State institutions involved, which legitimizes and guarantees the continuity, irreversibility and institutionality of said policy. In this sense, the IACHR understands that it is necessary for the comprehensive reparations program to function as a State policy that gives it stability and sustained validity over time. The implementation of a comprehensive reparations program such as the one proposed requires a commitment of social solidarity on the part of Colombian society with the victims of the conflict, which would be facilitated by a broad and thorough prior consultation process.

13. [...]The IACHR has also noted that the State must provide opportunities for victims to participate in decisions regarding the implementation of reparation mechanisms and policies²³⁴. In this sense, the suggested consultation process could serve as a propitious environment for victims and their representatives to present their points of view and inform the State of their specific needs. This will contribute to provide greater relevance and rationality to reparation policies, and will avoid actions that may be discriminatory.

35. [...] The IACHR observes that the participation of the victims in the different procedural stages is a guarantee of the right to truth and justice, forms part of the complex structure of weights and counterweights of the criminal process, and favors citizen oversight of the actions of the State.

B. TYPES OF REPAIRS

88. For methodological purposes, and in accordance with the categories of reparations usually used in the Inter-American System, this section addresses six types of reparations: (i) restitution measures; (ii) compensation measures; (iii) rehabilitation measures; (iii) satisfaction measures; (iv) justice measures; and (vi) measures of non-repetition. Each section begins with a brief description of the measure and an analysis of the specific aspects applicable to transitional justice contexts. Subsequently, a series of standards and pronouncements issued by the IACHR in the framework of its different mandates in transitional contexts are systematized.

1. Restitution measures

89. Restitution measures, as classic forms of reparation, are intended to reestablish the condition or situation in which the victims were before the violations of their rights were perpetrated. Depending on the nature of the violations, the adoption of restitution measures in the exercise of rights may be manifested through the termination or cessation of the activity or conduct violating the rights of the victims, and/or through other actions aimed at returning things to the state they were in before the events occurred²³⁵.

90. According to the IACHR, restitution measures apply²³⁶ :

[...] when the nature of the facts that gave rise to the violation makes it materially feasible and to the greatest extent possible. However, the adoption of these measures is especially limited in situations of an irreversible nature, such as in cases of extrajudicial execution, torture or sexual violence²³⁷ . According to the guidelines established within the IASHR, in cases where it is not possible to adopt restitution measures, other forms of reparation are particularly important, such as compensation or structural reparation measures, in accordance with the nature of the human rights violations and the harm caused to the victims²³⁸.

²³⁸ I.A. Court H.R.. Case of Blake v. Guatemala. Reparations and Costs. Judgment of January 22, 1999. Series C No. 48, para. 42.

91. Likewise, in accordance with the notion of integral reparation, the adoption of these types of measures must be complementary to other actions tending to remedy the damages caused²³⁹. There are cases in which restitution measures, although possible and necessary, are insufficient to achieve full reparation of the harm caused. For example, in cases of deprivation of liberty in which the victims have suffered cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment during their incarceration, the restitution of their liberty -although necessary- is not sufficient to make full reparation, so States must adopt additional and alternative measures aimed at remedying all the harm caused²⁴⁰.
92. In transitional contexts, some examples of restitution measures recommended by the IACHR are: (i) the restoration of the liberty of persons illegally or arbitrarily deprived of their liberty, which is equivalent to their immediate release²⁴¹; (ii) the review, annulment or cessation of effects of judicial sentences emanating from irregular processes²⁴²; (iii) the return to their place of origin of persons forcibly displaced as a consequence of acts or situations of violence²⁴³; (iv) the return, titling and demarcation of lands to protect communal property on ancestral territories²⁴⁴; (v) the restitution of identity in cases in which the victim was disappeared and his or her identity supplanted as a child²⁴⁵ ; and (vi) the restitution of employment and benefit rights²⁴⁶.

93. The restitution measures that the IACHR has mentioned most frequently in reports and cases related to transitional justice contexts are grouped into three categories.

1.1. Return of displaced persons or refugees and land restitution

94. One of the situations faced by countries with transitional contexts is the existence of populations that had to be internally displaced or take refuge in other countries as a result of violence. Faced with this reality, States must take measures to generate the necessary conditions to allow these individuals and communities to return to their place of origin and recover their properties and lands -both individual and collective. Likewise, the IACHR has indicated that the victims of forced intra-urban displacement must be taken into account as affected persons, whose rights must also be restored²⁴⁷ .

95. In this regard, the standards developed by the IACHR on how such return and/or restitution should be carried out consist of the following: (i) it must be carried out in a safe manner, so States must ensure that adequate security conditions exist for the return²⁴⁸ ; (ii) it must be equipped with agile and effective mechanisms to ensure the restitution of lands²⁴⁹; (iii) it must have monitoring and accompaniment schemes or mechanisms after the restitution²⁵⁰ ; and (iv) they must establish effective indicators to evaluate the implementation of the returns²⁵¹ . Among other issues, the IACHR has also established obligations regarding access to education, health, water, infrastructure, as well as the duty to ensure that persons who so require can obtain identity documents²⁵².

96. From an intersectional perspective, the IACHR has also ruled on displaced indigenous peoples returning to their ancestral territories in transitional contexts. In this regard, it has established the need to apply a differentiated approach in policies for the prevention and protection of displacement²⁵³ . In addition, the Commission has called for respect for their traditional forms of participation and organization upon return, and to ensure the effective restitution of the traditional use and exploitation of the territory²⁵⁴ . Similarly, the IACHR has urged States to address the impact and specific needs of LGBTI persons in the adoption of measures aimed at assisting this population in a situation of displacement²⁵⁵ .

1605. Based on the above conclusions,

THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS RECOMMENDS TO THE COLOMBIAN STATE,

1.3 [...]If appropriate, the State shall ensure conditions for victims who wish to return to the places from which they were displaced or exiled to do so safely.

Country reports

IACHR, Truth, Justice and Reparation: Fourth Report on Human Rights Situation in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II Doc. 49/13, December 31, 2013.

471. [...] The IACHR also pointed out that a bill of this type [draft law "whereby measures for the protection of victims of violence are enacted]" should contemplate the effects of the conflict on the ownership and possession of individual and collective territories, and aim at the creation of agile and effective mechanisms to ensure the restitution of land to the victims of dispossession.

579. [...] The Commission observes that the land claimants and the leaders of the restitution processes are in a special situation of risk, for which reason the State must adequately evaluate each specific situation, provide the most appropriate security measures and generate monitoring and accompaniment mechanisms after the restitution, as well as establish effective indicators to evaluate the implementation of the returns [...]. The Commission considers it important for the State to recognize the role of verification processes aimed at verifying that adequate security conditions exist in these cases. In this sense, it considers that the State should continue to deepen its efforts and the measures adopted to address the risk situation faced by the displaced population in the return process.

589. By virtue of what has been indicated in this section, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia that:

2. Implement appropriate measures to guarantee the protection and security of persons returning to the territories from which they were displaced, including the demining of the territories. Likewise, apply the differential approach in policies for the prevention and protection of displaced persons.

859. [...] in order to contribute to the protection and effective enjoyment of the individual and collective rights of the indigenous peoples in Colombia, the IACHR recommends to the Colombian State:

18. Implement decisive actions for the return of displaced indigenous peoples, communities and families, through a process that ensures respect for traditional forms of participation and organization; the security and especially the protection of traditional authorities, indigenous leaders; and the legal and material tenure of the territory so as to allow the effective restitution of the traditional use and exploitation of the territory and its management by the indigenous authorities.

IACHR, Fifth Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Guatemala, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.111 Doc. 21 rev.

42. Based on the foregoing analysis and conclusions, the Commission offers the following recommendations to assist in this process; specifically, that the State:

Allocate to the public institutions responsible for implementing aspects of the Resettlement Agreement the human and material resources necessary for the effective fulfillment of their mandates, and, in particular, strengthen the Technical Commission created to coordinate and facilitate the provisions of the Agreement.

7. Pay special attention to expanding the coverage and improving the content of education and health services for this population, continue to prioritize the need for primary education and health care, and the need for bilingual education in indigenous communities.

8. Provide additional resources for the creation of basic infrastructure, so that all communities have access, at a minimum, to potable water and sanitation facilities sufficient for health protection, and to improve housing assistance, as well as the construction of access roads, electricity and communications infrastructure.

9. Adopt the necessary legislative and other measures to extend the validity of the Special Temporary Law on Personal Documentation, and intensify the efforts being made within the framework of the National Plan for Personal Documentation, in order to ensure that all members of the population uprooted by the conflict can obtain identity documents.

134. [...] the State must build lasting solutions aimed at the restitution of the rights of the victims, as well as at supporting the reconstruction of their life project. The Commission considers that the victims of forced intra-urban displacement must be taken into account within the peace process, in order to have coherent agreements regarding comprehensive reparations for all victims of the internal armed conflict

1.2. Restitution of identity

97. Within the framework of armed conflicts and clandestine repressive operations during the dictatorships, children were abducted and appropriated after their parents were disappeared or executed. In the case of the Southern Cone dictatorships, this practice also acquired a transnational dimension, involving two or more countries in the framework of repressive coordination²⁵⁶.
98. Although the right to identity is not expressly contemplated in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (hereinafter "American Declaration") or in the American Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter "Convention" or "ACHR"), it has been developed in inter-American jurisprudence based, among others, on the rights to nationality, to a name and to a family²⁵⁷. Thus, this right has been conceptualized as "the set of attributes and characteristics that allow the individualization of the person in society and, in this sense, includes several other rights depending on the subject of rights in question and the circumstances of the case".²⁵⁸

99. As a measure to restore the right to identity and also as a guarantee of non-repetition, the IACHR has recommended that States restore the identity of children who disappeared during the dictatorships²⁵⁹ and make the necessary efforts to ensure family reunification²⁶⁰. Likewise, taking into account the transnational dimension of this phenomenon, the IACHR has referred to reciprocal assistance between States in the identification, location and return of these children²⁶¹.

THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS RECOMMENDS TO THE STATE OF ARGENTINA,

5. To adopt necessary measures of non-repetition to prevent similar incidents from taking place in the future. The measures of non-repetition in the instant case [...] should also include measures to continue to make the necessary efforts to ensure that investigations into crimes against humanity committed during the dictatorship move forward as quickly as possible and in accordance with the State's international obligations, and to re-establish the identity of children who disappeared during the dictatorship.

Application before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Gregoria Herminia Contreras and others (Case 12.517) against the Republic of El Salvador. June 28, 2010 (available in Spanish).

Articles 18 and 19 of the American Convention incorporate a right to identity and, in this sense, the total or partial suppression or modification of a child's right to preserve his or her identity and the elements that comprise it may engage the responsibility of the State. Likewise, in accordance with the obligations of Article 1(1) of the Convention, once the identity has been suppressed or modified, it is the duty of the State to seek its reestablishment and to carry out a complete, impartial and effective investigation to identify and, if necessary, punish those responsible.

261. Due to the nature of the instant case, the Commission requests the Court to order the State of El Salvador to conduct an impartial, diligent and effective investigation into the fate or whereabouts of Serapio Cristian and Julia Inés Contreras, Ana Julia and Carmelina Mejía Ramírez, and José Rubén Rivera. In case they are found, to order the reestablishment of their right to identity and to make the necessary efforts to ensure family reunification. In the event that it is established that some of them are not alive, take the necessary measures to deliver their remains to their family members.

Application before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Juan Gelman, María Claudia García Iruretagoyena de Gelman and María Macarena Gelman García Iruretagoyena (Case 12.607) against the Oriental Republic of Uruguay. January 21, 2010 (available in Spanish).

116. Article XII of the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons provides that States shall assist each other in seeking the identification, location and return of children removed to another State as a result of the forced disappearance of their parents. The fact that this practice has been so widespread that it has resulted in the mistaken identity of hundreds of children motivated the adoption of this provision in the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance.

117. The appropriation of María Macarena by the Uruguayan security forces prevented her from knowing her real family, her real mother, her real name, identity, nationality and assuming her true legal personality when she reached the age of majority - all the attributes of her identity. [...]

119. In this case, the Uruguayan State also failed to provide María Macarena Gelman with the special protection measures required by children [...].

135. It is also evident the harm caused to María Macarena Gelman by her own kidnapping, the suppression of her identity for 23 years of her life, and the impunity that exists in relation to these facts and in general with the violations committed against her, which include the impossibility of assuming her true legal personality, the violation of her right to privacy, to the protection of her family, to a name, to nationality, and to protection measures while she was a child.

1.3. Restitution of other rights

100. As indicated above, among the rights that must be restored in transitional processes are: (i) the restoration of the liberty of persons illegally or arbitrarily deprived of their liberty²⁶³ ; (ii) the review, annulment or cessation of effects of judicial sentences emanating from irregular processes, and consequently, the annulment of judicial, administrative, criminal or police records and cancellation of the corresponding records²⁶⁴ ; and (iii) the restitution of employment and benefit rights when the victim was arbitrarily separated from his or her job²⁶⁵ .

That the Peruvian State, by arbitrarily and illegally arresting and prosecuting Luis Alberto Cantoral Benavides in the Military Prison Courts, has violated, to his detriment, the right to personal liberty guaranteed by Article 7 [paragraphs 1 to 6] of the American Convention.

7. That, in consequence of what has been expressed in this Petition, order the Peruvian State that:

2. That, as a consequence of what is expressed in point 1 of this Petition, order the Peruvian State that:

i. Order the definitive and unconditional release of María Elena Loayza Tamayo.

2. Compensation measures

101. Compensation measures constitute an alternative mechanism in favor of the victims when restitution measures are not feasible and are complementary to the other types of reparation²⁶⁶. Compensation is generally monetary, that is, it implies the delivery of an amount of money that has the purpose of compensating the damages caused to the victims and their relatives for the violation of their human rights. In some cases, the compensation may be in kind²⁶⁷. This requires the delivery of a material good of the same characteristics and in the same conditions of which the victims were deprived by the violation of their human rights.
102. In the following, we will analyze general aspects related to compensation measures in particular, in light of various pronouncements on reparations to victims who -directly and indirectly- have been affected by violations that occurred in transitional justice contexts.

2.1. Indemnification

103. According to the criteria established by the organs of the Inter-American System, compensation is merely compensatory in nature and is granted to the extent and measure sufficient to compensate both the material and non-material damages²⁶⁸ caused to the victims and their family members. In this sense, compensation may not imply enrichment or impoverishment for the victim or his or her successors²⁶⁹ . Likewise, the States may, if applicable, deduct the amounts paid for reparations at the domestic level²⁷⁰ . In this regard, the I.A. Court H.R. has established that "if there are national mechanisms to determine forms of reparation, these procedures and their results must be evaluated²⁷¹ , provided that they meet criteria of objectivity, reasonableness and effectiveness to adequately redress the violations of rights declared by the Court²⁷² "273.

104. Unlike the I/A Court H.R. when recommending the payment of economic compensation in individual cases or when requesting it from the Court, the IACHR does not usually establish a specific amount. The amount is established by mutual agreement between the parties, taking into consideration the Inter-American and national criteria that are deemed appropriate²⁷⁴.

1. Make full reparations for the human rights violations declared in this report, both materially and morally, suffered by the victims of the case, which include the children of Mr. Jose Rusbel Lara, as well as the other family members referred to in the report who assumed the care of his children after his death.

VII. REPAIRS

- (a) The State recognizes that the acceptance of its international responsibility for the violations of the human rights of the Victims implies the responsibility to pay fair compensation to the Petitioners under the parameters defined by mutual agreement between the parties, taking into consideration the criteria of the Inter-American System and those of a national nature that are deemed convenient to apply in the negotiation.

- (b) The State undertakes to reach agreements, which will define the amount and term of payment of economic compensation, with each of the victim families separately, before the end of the first quarter of 2005.

enrichment or impoverishment for the victim or his successors²⁷⁷.

33. The Inter-American Commission considers it essential that the Paraguayan State [...] also comply with its obligation, which it expressly recognized when it enacted Law 838/96, and which, as explained above, has not been applied in practice due to the failure to appoint the Ombudsman, to compensate the victims of such violations, or their family members. As has been pointed out, it must be taken into account that as the years go by, the health situation of those who suffered long years of confinement and cruel torture is worsening, and many of them are dying in abandonment and destitution.²⁷⁸

39. The Inter-American Commission considers it important that in order to establish the amount of compensation and to try to repair in some way the grave human rights violations committed during the dictatorship, Paraguay take into account the "Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to Reparation for Victims of Human Rights Violations and International Humanitarian Law", prepared by the UN Special Rapporteur Theo Van Boven, which states the following:

482. [...] Regarding the reparations established in the law on compensation, the IACHR recalled in the press release it issued following its visit that the obligation to provide compensation derives from the status of the victims of grave human rights violations suffered at the hands of the State, and the State should therefore take all measures to adequately guarantee this aspect of reparations.

2.2. Material damage

105. Material damages refer to those impacts of a patrimonial or pecuniary nature that the victims have had to face as a consequence of the violation of their human rights and that can be determined in concrete monetary amounts, if there is evidence that allows it²⁷⁹. In some cases, especially in contexts of serious human rights violations and/or when there is a long denial of justice, the I/A Court H.R. tends to be more flexible and order amounts in equity²⁸⁰.
106. Material damages include consequential damages and loss of profits. Emerging damage refers to the pecuniary damage derived immediately and directly from the facts²⁸¹. The notion of consequential damages includes, among others, health expenses, expenses of an extrajudicial investigation with the purpose of clarifying the actions perpetrated against the victims or the fate of the missing or dead persons, or expenses for another concept. This, provided that such expenses have a causal link with the facts constituting human rights violations²⁸².
107. On the other hand, loss of earnings constitutes all income lost by the victims as a direct and immediate consequence of the violation of their rights²⁸³. This, taking into account that the compensation measures for material damages reflect the harmful effect on the conditions that - objectively - the victims enjoyed, as well as the reasonable probability that such conditions would have continued or progressed. In this sense, the quantification must take into account, among other notions, the life expectancy in cases of persons who died as a result of the respective violation²⁸⁴. Thus, for example, in cases of forced disappearances or extrajudicial executions, the loss of earnings consists of the income lost since the person disappeared or lost his or her life²⁸⁵. Likewise, in addition to the age of the person at the time of the events, the person's profession or level of education is taken into account, which is related to the income that could have been earned during the remaining working life²⁸⁶.

135. [...] With regard to loss of earnings, it is requested that the income that the family could have received if Marco Antonio Malina had not been deprived of his life be taken into account. This takes into account that he was 14 years old on the date of his disappearance, in a country with a life expectancy of 56.0 years, and that in two years he would have graduated from high school and would have begun a career in engineering.

136. Regarding consequential damages, it is requested that the expenses incurred by the victim's family as a direct consequence of the facts be considered. These expenses are related to the steps taken to establish the whereabouts of Marco Antonio Malina, namely: transfers to police centers, courts, detention centers; paid field publications in local newspapers; stationery and photocopies related to the case and the hiring of a lawyer.

137. Given that the family has been receiving psychological medical treatment from the time the events occurred, it is considered that such expenses related to care, as well as the payment of professionals should also be taken into account. Likewise, the expenses incurred to leave the country and settle in exile; as well as the expenses related to the processing of the complaint at the international level.

138. On the other hand, the family actively participated in the search for Marco Antonio Malina, taking countless steps. At the time of the disappearance, in October 1981, the victim's family had a stable economic situation. As a consequence of the disappearance of Marco Antonio Malina, the lives of his immediate family changed radically. This change had a considerable impact on the family's assets, which should be compensated in fairness.

2.3. Non-pecuniary damage

108. Non-pecuniary or moral damages refer to the suffering and affliction caused to the direct victims and/or their family members, the impairment of life or cultural values, and alterations of a non-pecuniary or pecuniary nature, in the conditions of existence of the victims and/or their family members²⁸⁹ . It implies, therefore, compensating for the disruption of the victim's life project caused by the international responsibility of the State²⁹⁰ . Since such damages are not economically quantifiable, they are assessed on the basis of the application of the criterion of equity in representative monetary amounts or even by means of the delivery of goods or services that can be valued in money²⁹¹ . Likewise, as will be seen below, the compensation of these damages can also be carried out by means of satisfaction measures.

109. The determination of the compensation measures to be adopted to repair non-pecuniary damages must take into special consideration the particular conditions of the victims or their relatives. This, in order to determine the relevance and value that can be assigned to the affliction or pain, to the alteration of the conditions of existence or to the impairment of intangible assets that have been damaged by the violations of rights²⁹² . They must also consider the effect that the human rights violations had on the victims' life project²⁹³.
110. In cases of serious human rights violations, the moral harm suffered by the victims is presumed, and therefore does not require proof²⁹⁴ . According to the IACHR, such harm is a necessary consequence of the nature of the violations and its existence is evident given that it is inherent to human nature that every person subjected to serious violations experiences moral suffering²⁹⁵. Likewise, in the case of human rights violations that are particularly serious, it is presumed that the direct family members of the victims suffer moral damage, such as mothers, fathers, spouses or partners, as well as sons and daughters of the direct victims²⁹⁶.

Cases submitted to the I/A Court H.R.

Application before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Rainer Ibsen Cárdenas and José Luís Ibsen Peña (Case 12.529) against the Republic of Bolivia. May 12, 2009 (available in Spanish).

341. Regarding non-pecuniary damage, the Court has established that:

[...] Non-pecuniary damage may include both the suffering and affliction caused to the direct victims and their family members, the impairment of values that are very significant for the persons, as well as the alterations, of a non-pecuniary nature, in the living conditions of the victim or his family. Since it is not possible to assign a precise monetary equivalent to non-pecuniary damage, it can only be compensated for the purposes of full reparation to the victims, and this can be done in two ways.

Firstly, through the payment of a sum of money or the delivery of goods or services appreciable in money, as determined by the Court in reasonable application of judicial discretion and in terms of equity. And, secondly, by carrying out acts or works of public scope or repercussion that have effects such as the recovery of the memory of the victims, the recognition of their dignity, the consolation of their bereaved or the transmission of a message of official reprobation of the human rights violations in question and of commitment to the efforts tending to prevent their recurrence²⁹⁷.

239. Likewise, the Court has developed important jurisprudence establishing the existence of a presumption regarding the non-pecuniary damage suffered by the victims' family members²⁹⁸. As the Court has established, the fact that the authorities have not been able to discover the truth of human rights violations of this gravity can generate intense suffering and anguish for the family members, as well as feelings of insecurity, frustration and impotence²⁹⁹, which has indeed occurred in the present case and, in addition, has been aggravated by the lack of access to information regarding what happened.

188. In the instant case, the suffering experienced by the victims' family members as a consequence of the lack of a diligent investigation of the facts and the consequent punishment of those responsible, among other grievances, justifies the Commission's request to the Court, taking into account the nature of the case, to set the amount of compensation for non-pecuniary damages in equity.

2. Non-pecuniary damage

In the case of the victims of death and forced disappearance, it is presumed that the victims suffered profound anguish before being executed by members of the Military Dictatorship, and in the case of the members of COFADEPA.HG, the disappearance and death of their relatives still caused the families anguish, uncertainty, desperation, impotence and frustration. In addition, after 50 years, some of those responsible for the death and disappearance have been found, brought to trial and sentenced, but there are still people accused, but currently fugitives from justice for crimes against humanity, increasing the suffering of the victim's family.

There are other aspects that have affected the relatives, on the one hand, not being able to mourn the possible death of their disappeared, which has caused, even after years, instability and pain for the victims' relatives, and, on the other hand, the lack of a resting place for the remains of the victims keeps the families uncertain about their whereabouts.

2.4. Administrative repair programs

111. In transitional justice contexts, in which States must provide reparations to a massive number of victims that may far exceed the capacities and possibilities of domestic courts, administrative reparations programs constitute one of the legitimate ways of satisfying the right to reparation³⁰¹. The IACHR has established a series of requirements that these programs must meet. For example, it has indicated that they must be accessible, flexible, transparent, public, agile and inexpensive³⁰²; that they must be designed in a participatory and transparent process with the victims, civil society and State institutions involved; and that their stability and sustained validity over time must be guaranteed³⁰³. Therefore, reparation programs should be part of a State policy on the matter³⁰⁴.

³⁰¹ See in this regard, IACHR, Main Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131, Doc. 1, February 19, 2008.

³⁰² IACHR, Main Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131. Doc. 1, February 19, 2008, para. 3.

³⁰⁴ IACHR, Main Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131. Doc. 1, February 19, 2008, para. 4.

112. On the other hand, the IACHR has been clear in determining that these programs should not exclude victims' access to judicial remedies³⁰⁵. They are, therefore, complementary actions and the State always has the power to compensate in a judicial process what has been paid to a victim under an administrative reparations program³⁰⁶. In addition, it has established certain criteria that these processes must follow. In particular, it has indicated that they must guarantee minimum standards of respect for the right to due administrative process, and that a comprehensive evidentiary system must be sought, in which the State has an active role in the production and collection of relevant information to verify the veracity of the facts denounced. Likewise, the State must provide a free legal assistance service to guarantee access to justice for the victims³⁰⁷.

Country reports

IACHR, Truth, Justice and Reparation: Fourth Report on Human Rights Situation in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II Doc. 49/13, December 31, 2013.

523. The IACHR therefore understands that reparations through administrative channels should not be subject to the requirement that the victim withdraw from the judicial proceeding. The IACHR considers that both actions should be complementary and that the State would always retain the power to compensate in a judicial proceeding what was paid to a victim under the administrative reparations program. Thus, it is considered that there is no cost of double reparation to be borne by the State. It is also possible that the

173. Similarly, the Commission has ruled on the existence of different avenues for reparations to victims in situations of serious human rights violations. In this regard, the IACHR has indicated that "it understands that the adoption of a program of administrative reparations should not exclude access to judicial remedies for the victims, thus allowing them to choose the route they consider most appropriate to ultimately ensure that reparations are obtained. The IACHR considers that the State could have and implement adequate institutional mechanisms to respect this right of the victims to resort to various differentiated avenues of reparation, without risk to the public treasury"³⁰⁹.

174. Thus, on this issue, the Commission has concluded that "both bodies of the Inter-American System have understood that the administrative and judicial remedies are complementary and not exclusive, and that it is possible for both to converge and to allow the judicial remedy to deduct or compensate for what has already been paid in the administrative remedy. It also indicated that although there is an administrative reparations program, "in accordance with Articles 8(1) and 25(1) of the American Convention, the victims of serious human rights violations must have access to justice to request a judicial declaration of State responsibility; for an individual determination of the harm in the specific case; or to question the sufficiency of the reparations previously received". The IACHR was explicit in stating that "this right should not be limited by the fact of having participated in an administrative reparations program"³¹⁰.

Practical Guides, Guidelines and other Directives

IACHR, Principal Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131, Doc. 1, February 19, 2008.

3. The State, when defining a public reparation policy, should aim to repair the damages caused by paramilitary violence, and based on the standards of international human rights law, making available administrative, agile and low-cost ways to access economic reparation programs. This is without prejudice to other forms of non-material reparations, collective reparations and social programs and services that could be established for the population affected during the conflict³¹¹ [...].

Special social benefits with a sense of reparation such as those granted in the Chilean case, such as reparatory pensions, educational benefits for the children of the disappeared, health services through the Program for Reparation and Integral Attention in Health and Human Rights (PRAIS). ICTJ. The Handbook of Reparations. The Reparations Policy for Human Rights Violations in Chile by Elizabeth Lira, Chapter II, 2006, pp. 60-64.

6. [...] The subsistence of the right to demand reparation from the victimizer is not related to the collection of administrative reparation from the Colombian State, since these are different claims, with different objects and different parties liable. The IACHR understands then that the administrative reparation should not be subject to the requirement of withdrawal of the legal action by the victim. The IACHR considers that both actions should be complementary and that the State would always retain the power to compensate in a judicial proceeding what was paid to a victim under the administrative reparations program. Thus, it is considered that there is no cost of double reparation to be borne by the State. It is also possible that the implementation of the administrative program will also have the effect of reducing litigation in the area of reparations.

7. [...] The IACHR understands that the concept of reparations is rooted in a principle of obligation, in contrast to an ex gratia payment. Therefore, we understand that the administrative reparations procedure should not imply a waiver of the contentious-administrative judicial action that seeks precisely to determine the legal responsibility of the State, nor a waiver of the reparations incident. In this sense, the victims should maintain their right of judicial action in the contentious-administrative sphere, in order to determine the possible State responsibility for serious violations committed by paramilitaries, as has been established in precedents of the Council of State. Likewise, the State could always compensate what it grants through the administrative reparations program for what it may be obliged to compensate in an administrative litigation process.

9. With respect to the procedures to be implemented in the framework of the comprehensive reparations program, the IACHR considers that they must respect the rights and guarantees established in Articles 8 and 25 of the American Convention. These procedures must guarantee minimum standards of respect for the right to due process. [...] ³¹².

11. The IACHR considers that these procedures should be accessible, flexible, transparent and public, except for information that could put the victims at risk. In view of the nature of these administrative procedures, the characteristics of the facts being redressed, and the condition of numerous victims of the Colombian conflict, the IACHR considers that a comprehensive evidentiary system should be sought in which the State plays an active role in the production and collection of relevant information to verify the veracity of the facts denounced. In this sense, the IACHR considers that the possibility of using circumstantial evidence, the testimony of the victims themselves and their relatives, the accompaniment of individual facts with information on the social context and the patterns of violations and facts accredited in cases processed before the Colombian courts, the IACHR and the Inter-American Court should be contemplated. Likewise, the IACHR has established that the State has the obligation to guarantee access to justice for the victims. In this regard, the IACHR considers it appropriate for the State to provide an accessible and comprehensive service of free legal assistance.

3. Rehabilitation measures

113. Rehabilitation measures are aimed at the physical, psychological and social rehabilitation of victims. These measures must be distinguished from the social services provided to the general population ³¹³. In this sense, these measures must be strictly conditioned by the particularities and specific needs of each victim. Likewise, their provision must consider the needs expressed by the victims, based on factors such as their gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, age, ethnic or racial status, or situation of poverty or extreme poverty³¹⁴.

114. Next, we will analyze, on the one hand, physical, psychological and psychiatric rehabilitation measures and, on the other hand, social rehabilitation measures, focused on cases related to transitional justice contexts.

3.1. Physical, psychological and psychiatric rehabilitation

115. Physical and/or psychological rehabilitation measures are aimed at counteracting the effects that human rights violations have had on the physical and mental health of the victims and/or their family members. Therefore, they may be of a medical, psychological and/or psychiatric nature.
116. The IACHR has detailed the manner in which this care should be provided. In this regard, it has emphasized that: (i) it must be adequate, timely and a priority³¹⁵ ; (ii) free and immediate³¹⁶ ; (iii) provided by public health institutions³¹⁷ ; (iv) personalized, that is, adapted to the particular circumstances and needs of each

117. On the other hand, the IACHR has referred to the differentiated approach that physical, psychological and psychiatric medical assistance should have. Some examples include: (i) the need to address differential guidelines and orientations in the case of children and adolescents³²² ; and (ii) the cultural adaptation and removal of obstacles that prevent real access to services in the case of indigenous peoples³²³.

treatment³²⁴ , with prior expression of her will, and for as long as necessary, taking into account the effects generated by the armed conflict, as well as the autonomy of health professionals. In any case, Nicolasa and her family will be able to choose the gender of the professional of their preference to provide care, taking into account the human resources available in the EPS and its network of providers.

Psychosocial care will be provided within the framework of the modalities foreseen in the PAPSIVI guidelines; in the case of family care, it will be guaranteed that Nicolasa and the other beneficiary members of the measure will have the autonomy to identify the members of the family nucleus whose relationship is essential for their emotional rehabilitation. In the event that the care is provided for the benefit of children and adolescents, the guidelines and differential orientations provided by the Ministry will be implemented. Both the EPS and the psychosocial teams of the Program shall articulate to agree on common and complementary objectives between the two components of the Program, i.e. mental health care and psychosocial care.

23. Carry out actions to ensure total health coverage of the indigenous population, overcoming obstacles that prevent real access to services, and the cultural adaptation of these services.

3.2. Social rehabilitation

118. Social rehabilitation measures are aimed at repairing the victims and/or their families through the recognition and implementation of actions that have a favorable impact on their social conditions. These measures may be aimed at restoring social conditions that were seriously affected by the human rights violations, or, if applicable, at transforming those that motivated or promoted the respective violations. These measures have a transformative vocation because they not only contribute to the change and social promotion of the victims and their families, but are also aimed at the community³²⁶. As in the case of other rehabilitation measures, their design and implementation must include the participation of the victims and/or family members to whom they are addressed.
119. Among the most common social rehabilitation measures are educational measures. These are generally implemented through financial assistance to cover tuition and, in some cases, living expenses³²⁷. They may also take other forms, depending on what the parties agree. Depending on the circumstances of each case, such measures may be aimed at supporting basic or advanced studies, professional or technical³²⁸, in public or private institutions. Social rehabilitation measures may also be aimed at supporting labor reinsertion or providing the necessary inputs for the family to

The Commission underscores the importance of the Community Based Rehabilitation Strategy and supports the State in the development of a support system so that persons with disabilities can live in the community.

4. Satisfaction measures

120. The measures of satisfaction consist of actions of a symbolic, moral or non-pecuniary nature that seek to restore the dignity, honor and historical memory of the victims. These measures have a transcendental significance in the recovery of the dignity and reputation of the victims, in addition to constituting important elements to reinforce the State's commitment not to repeat similar violations in the future³³². In this sense, the IACHR has stated that the fundamental value of the recovery of the historical memory of serious human rights violations constitutes, in addition to a means of satisfaction for the victims, a mechanism of prevention and nonrepetition³³³. It is for this reason that measures of satisfaction can share the purpose of guarantees of non-repetition, particularly when they are aimed at the dissemination, recovery or preservation of historical memory.

121. In transitional justice contexts, the gravity and nature of human rights violations require that the State adopt measures aimed at dignifying the memory of the victims³³⁴. A fundamental requirement for the satisfaction measures to fulfill their purpose is that they be agreed upon with the victims and/or their relatives. This requirement also addresses the principle of participation of the victims in the design and adoption of reparation measures.
122. Below are grouped into two broad categories those measures of satisfaction that the IACHR has most frequently recommended in reports and cases related to transitional justice contexts. This is not an exhaustive list since, as the IACHR has indicated, "the catalog of measures of satisfaction may be as broad as the diversity of the non-pecuniary damages suffered by the victims of human rights violations³³⁵".

4.1. Publication of judgments and other decisions

123. A standard measure of satisfaction in judgments adopted by the I.A. Court H.R. is the publication of the judgment, an aspect that is also often included in friendly settlement agreements before the IACHR. The I.A. Court H.R. generally requests States to publish "in a legible and appropriate font size": (i) the official summary of the judgment in a newspaper of national circulation; and (ii) the full judgment on the website of the Ministry of

124. The IACHR has also required States to publish internal decisions or proceedings as individual measures of satisfaction and general measures so that society, as a whole, may know the truth of the events that occurred³³⁷. Likewise, taking into account the differentiated and intercultural approach that reparation measures should have, the IACHR has recommended as a measure of satisfaction the dissemination of the I.A. Court H.R.'s judgment on community radio stations in the language of the affected indigenous communities³³⁸.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas," May 27, 2017.

Principle IX

Design and implementation of memory initiatives

States must design and implement initiatives aimed at acknowledging and apologizing for the facts related to serious human rights violations, vindicating the memory and dignity of the victims, and establishing and disseminating the historical truth of such facts. Such initiatives may include public acts, educational, cultural or other measures, respectful of interculturality and diversity, and with a human rights and gender perspective, exemplified by the following:

d. Publication and official dissemination of court rulings on serious human rights violations that have occurred;

4.2. Acts of acknowledgment of responsibility and public apologies

125. The purpose of these acts is for the State to expressly acknowledge its international responsibility for the human rights violations declared by the IACHR or the I/A Court H.R. in an individual case, in addition to apologizing to the victims and their families. This measure seeks to restore the dignity of the victims, recover their public image and promote a break with the events that gave rise to the human rights violations³⁴⁰.

126. In general, they are public events and broadcast in the media, unless otherwise decided by the parties. It is essential that the States include the victims and/or their family members in the planning of the event and, in this regard, that they jointly agree on aspects such as the date, place and modality of the event³⁴¹. Although the parties are the ones who agree on the details of the modality of the act, sometimes the organs of the System establish some guidelines, such as that the acknowledgment of responsibility and apology be made by high authorities of the State³⁴². On the other hand, such acts must be respectful of interculturality and diversity, in addition to having a human rights and gender perspective³⁴³.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas", May 27, 2017, Principle IX "Design and implementation of memory initiatives."

States must design and implement initiatives aimed at acknowledging and apologizing for the facts related to serious human rights violations, vindicating the memory and dignity of the victims, and establishing and disseminating the historical truth of such facts. Such initiatives may include public acts, educational, cultural or other measures, respectful of interculturality and diversity, and with a human rights and gender perspective, exemplified by the following:

a. Carrying out public acts of recognition of the State's responsibility with a request for forgiveness by the authorities agreed with the victims or their representatives and disseminated through the media;

4.3. Tributes in honor of the victims

127. This type of satisfaction measures seek to vindicate the memory of the victims and preserve the memory of the serious human rights violations they faced. They can be implemented through a wide range of measures to commemorate their life and legacy, depending on the nature of the case and the will of the victims and/or their relatives. Some examples of these measures are commemorative plaques³⁴⁴; the construction of monuments³⁴⁵ ; documentaries on the life and work of the victim³⁴⁶; the naming of public places³⁴⁷ ; explanatory brochures³⁴⁸; the designation of a national day related to the facts of the case³⁴⁹, and ceremonies and commemorations of various kinds³⁵⁰.
128. The implementation of these measures of satisfaction must take into account the importance of using cultural and artistic means to achieve the purposes of reparations for victims of human rights violations. Likewise, by promoting structural impacts, the symbolic nature of satisfaction measures is fully in line with the transformative vocation of reparations³⁵¹.

142. As reparatory measures of satisfaction, it is considered that the memory of the child Marco Antonio Malina Theissen must be duly vindicated, on behalf of the hundreds of children, adolescents and young people who were victims of the dark period of the armed conflict in Guatemala. In this sense, the Honorable Court is requested to designate a room under the name of "Hall of the Rights of the Child: Marco Antonio Malina Theissen" in which an exhibition of photos of him and other children who have suffered similar situations, explanatory brochures in honor of the memory of children victims of violence in all its senses during the time of the armed conflict will be kept.

As another way to ensure that society and the authorities do not forget what happened and honor the memory of child victims of war-related disappearances, the designation of a national day for children who disappeared as victims of the internal armed conflict in Guatemala is requested. This day would imply the remembrance and mourning for all children and their families and as a sign of hope and reflection, in adults and children about the horrible consequences of a war. Likewise, the publication of the decision of the H. Court in the Official Gazette of Guatemala and in other newspapers of circulation in the country.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas," May 27, 2017, Principle IX "Design and implementation of memory initiatives."

States must design and implement initiatives aimed at acknowledging and apologizing for the facts related to serious human rights violations, vindicating the memory and dignity of the victims, and establishing and disseminating the historical truth of such facts. Such initiatives may include public acts, educational, cultural or other measures, respectful of interculturality and diversity, and with a human rights and gender perspective, exemplified by the following:

c. Creation of a national commemorative day to remember the serious human rights violations that have occurred;

[...]

e. Installation of monuments, signage in public spaces, memorials, and museums in recognition of the victims, and removal or contextualized amendment of monuments, memorials, museums, shields, insignia, and plaques that praise the memory of perpetrators;

f. Development of commemorations and tributes to the victims that evoke their lives and stories;

g. Placement of plaques in different places where the victims left their footprints;

5. Measures in the area of justice

129. In cases of serious human rights violations that occur as part of a systematic pattern, the organs of the System have indicated that justice measures take on particular intensity and importance given the seriousness of the crimes committed and the nature of the rights violated³⁵². This, given that the imperative need to prevent the repetition of such acts depends, to a large extent, on avoiding impunity and satisfying the expectations of the victims and society as a whole to have access to the truth about what happened³⁵³.

5.1. Investigation and sanction

130. States have the obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish those responsible for human rights violations and, in this sense, they are obliged to guarantee the victims and society the right to know the truth. This obligation acquires a special and strict connotation in cases of serious rights violations. In addition to constituting forms of administering justice, these measures are designed to maximize knowledge of the truth of what happened³⁵⁴.
131. The following is a systematization of some IACHR standards and criteria applicable to cases in transitional justice contexts, such as: (i) general aspects on how the investigation should be carried out in these contexts; (ii) due diligence in the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations; (iii) obstacles in the investigation of these violations; (iv) sentence reduction, alternative measures to deprivation of liberty and prison benefits; (v) denial and obstruction of justice; and (vi) adoption of differentiated and intersectional approaches.

5.1.1. General Aspects

132. In the framework of its various mandates, the IACHR has referred to various aspects of the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations, which are applicable to transitional contexts. Among them, it has reiterated that these investigations must be promoted by the State³⁵⁵, that they cannot be carried out under military criminal jurisdiction³⁵⁶, and that States must provide victims with access to adequate and effective remedies³⁵⁷. In this regard, the Commission has also indicated that the family members must have full access and capacity to act in all stages and instances of the investigation³⁵⁸.

133. On the other hand, the Commission has been clear in pointing out that the existence of Truth Commissions, administrative reparations programs and payment of economic compensation does not exempt States from the obligation to investigate and punish³⁵⁹. It has also stressed that impunity contributes to the perpetuation of violence.³⁶⁰

The Court has also established that the obligation to investigate acquires a particular and decisive intensity and importance in view of the seriousness of the crimes committed and the nature of the rights harmed, as in cases of serious human rights violations that occurred as part of a systematic pattern or practice applied or tolerated by the State, since the imperative need to prevent the repetition of such acts depends, to a large extent, on avoiding impunity and satisfying the expectations of the victims and society as

The acknowledgement of responsibility made by the Government, the partial investigation of the facts, and the subsequent payment of compensation are not, by themselves, sufficient to comply with the obligations under the Convention. According to Article 1(1) of the Convention, the State has the obligation to investigate violations committed within its jurisdiction, to identify those responsible, to impose appropriate sanctions and to ensure adequate reparation to the victim³⁶⁴ .

The Inter-American Court has established that in a democratic State under the rule of law, military criminal jurisdiction must have a restrictive and exceptional scope and be aimed at the protection of special legal interests, linked to the functions assigned by law to the military forces. Therefore, it should only be used to try military personnel for the commission of crimes or misdemeanors that, by their very nature, infringe upon legal interests specific to the military order³⁶⁵ . Likewise, the Inter-American Court has pointed out that "when the military justice system assumes jurisdiction over a matter that should be heard by the ordinary justice system, the right to a natural judge is affected and, a fortiori, due process", which, in turn, is IACHR, Truth, Justice and Reparation: Fourth Report on Human Rights Situation in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II Doc. 49/13, December 31, 2013.

199. By virtue of what has been indicated in this section, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia that:

2. Adopt the pertinent measures so that members of the security forces who are allegedly involved in cases of human rights violations and/or IHL are suspended from active service until a final decision is issued in the disciplinary or criminal proceedings that are being processed.

511. [...] the Commission reiterates that overcoming the situation of impunity with respect to human rights violations and strengthening the mechanisms of access to justice, judicial guarantees, and judicial protection are indispensable to guarantee the sustainability and success of the implementation of some reparation policies, such as land restitution. The deactivation of the factors of violence and the protection of victims and claimant leaders are closely linked to the progress of investigations in this regard.

1201.[...] the State must exhaust all available means to clarify, investigate, and punish all those responsible for the commission of human rights violations³⁶⁸ . Likewise, all actions and measures undertaken in this sense must focus on the centrality of the expectations and needs of the victims, in order to achieve a restorative effect.

1204. [...] In order to respond legitimately and effectively to violations of fundamental rights, the administration of justice requires rules that are adapted to the needs of society, and that conform to general principles such as the right of access to justice, the impartiality of the judge, the procedural equality of the parties, and the enforceability and effectiveness of court decisions³⁶⁹ .

IACHR, Report on the Demobilization Process in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.120 Doc. 60, December 13, 2004.

41. States should adopt the necessary measures to facilitate victims' access to adequate and effective remedies both to denounce the commission of these crimes [crimes under international law] and to obtain reparations for the harm suffered and thus contribute to preventing their repetition. Note S-GA/ID-13-048140, December 2, 2013, para. 632). The IACHR appreciates the work done by the Truth Commission, but considers it important to reiterate that the presentation of its Report and the important findings indicated therein do not exempt the State from its international obligation to investigate, prosecute and punish through judicial channels State agents who have committed human rights violations³⁷¹.

IACHR, Annual Report, Chapter IV. Haiti, 2005

The Commission considers it important to emphasize the responsibility of the State to investigate and prosecute human rights abuses in accordance with these [international] standards, whoever is responsible and whatever the abuses committed, including violations perpetrated during the military dictatorship of the early 1990s or in the course of previous and current governments. The state must also take the necessary measures to ensure that no person implicated in such crimes is incorporated into the State security forces.

27. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that all the judicial cases brought against Alfredo Stroessner, his collaborators and members of the repressive apparatus be concluded, imposing the criminal sanctions corresponding to the gravity of the facts and the degree of responsibility. For its part, the Commission insists that all necessary actions be taken to obtain the extradition of Alfredo Stroessner for his trial in the cases pending before the Paraguayan justice system.

28. In the Commission's opinion, the investigation and punishment of those most responsible for the violations committed during the dictatorship is one of the best guarantees to ensure the non-repetition of such acts.

170. The Commission has recognized that, in serious, systematic and prolonged situations of human rights violations, States can create administrative reparation programs that allow affected persons to have recourse to expeditious and effective mechanisms. However, the Commission has emphasized that the reparation mechanisms offered by the State must be comprehensive in the sense of taking into account all the components of reparation in accordance with the State's international obligations. In particular, the Commission has considered that the determination of reparation, whether determined administratively or judicially, does not exempt the State from its obligations related to the component of justice for the violations caused, which obliges the State to guarantee the victims the investigation and punishment of those responsible for those violations, in accordance with the provisions of international law³⁷² .

5.1.2. Due diligence in the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations

134. In cases of serious human rights violations, there is a reinforced duty of the State to promote the development of the investigation³⁷³ . Among the aspects that should govern this reinforced obligation within the framework of the investigations are: (i) ex officio initiation by the State³⁷⁴ ; (ii) reasonable time frame³⁷⁵ ; (iii) impartial and exhaustive investigation that seeks to prosecute and punish all persons responsible, at the material and intellectual level³⁷⁶ , as well as the structure that favored or encouraged the commission of violations³⁷⁷ ; (iv) exhaustion of all logical lines of investigation³⁷⁸ ; (v) access by the authorities to relevant documentation and

155. It follows from inter-American jurisprudence that under Articles 8 and 25 of the Convention, when the authorities have knowledge of a possible case of enforced disappearance or torture, they have a reinforced duty in the promotion and development of the investigation, which includes, as relevant to the present case: (i) initiating the investigation ex officio whenever there is a complaint or well-founded reason to suspect that such crimes occurred; (ii) ordering and practicing the relevant evidence in accordance with the duty of due diligence; (iii) guaranteeing independence and impartiality in the investigation; and (iv) removing the obstacles that threaten the proper development of the investigation, among others.

325. In accordance with the Court's jurisprudence, and given the particular gravity of the human rights violations that occurred in the instant case, full reparation requires that the Bolivian State investigate with due diligence, in a serious, impartial and exhaustive manner, the forced disappearance of Rainer Ibsen Cárdenas and José Luís Ibsen Peña, with the purpose of clarifying the historical truth of the facts and

2. To carry out an impartial and exhaustive investigation in order to judge and punish those materially and intellectually responsible for the death of Norberto Javier Restrepo and to establish the truth of what happened. Friendly Settlement Reports

IACHR, Report No. 92/18. Case 12.941. Friendly Settlement. Nicolasa and family members. Colombia. August 23, 2018.

Part Five: Remedies agreed between the parties

The State must take decisive measures to advance substantively and within a reasonable period of time in the investigation being carried out into the crime of forced displacement of which Nicolasa and her family were victims, clarify the facts, identify those responsible as far as possible, and make the information on the case available, within the framework of legal confidentiality. In compliance with this obligation, the State must remove all obstacles, de facto and de jure, that have impeded the effective progress of the investigation, for which the reassignment of the investigation must be processed in order to guarantee not only its momentum, but also the conditions of access to justice for the family.

125. [...] Consequently, the Court has established in detail the elements that lead to the fulfillment of the right to the truth as a measure of reparation.

126. In particular, the Court has ordered the following measures:

(i) "initiate, promote, reopen, direct, continue and conclude, as appropriate, with the utmost diligence, the relevant investigations and proceedings within a reasonable time, in order to establish the full truth of the facts and determine any criminal liability that may exist, and remove all de facto and de jure obstacles that maintain total impunity";

(iii) "take into account the systematic pattern of human rights violations [...] so that the relevant processes and investigations are conducted in consideration of the complexity of these facts and the context in which they occurred [...]";

(iv) "identify and individualize all material and intellectual authors [...]";

(v) "ensure that the competent authorities carry out the corresponding investigations ex officio and that to this end they have within their reach and use all the logistical and scientific resources necessary to gather and process the evidence and, in particular, have the powers to access the relevant documentation and information to investigate the facts denounced and promptly carry out those actions and inquiries essential to clarify what happened in the present case";

(vi) "ensure that the investigations [...] remain, at all times, under the cognizance of the ordinary jurisdiction";

(xv) "to execute outstanding arrest warrants for the alleged perpetrators and to issue the relevant warrants in order to prosecute all those responsible;"

144. The Commission reiterates that the State must initiate, develop and complete, in the ordinary criminal jurisdiction, in accordance with the standards of due diligence and within a reasonable period of time, the relevant investigations to clarify the cases of extrajudicial executions and punish those responsible. In this sense, the investigation should not only be aimed at identifying those directly responsible, but also the structure that favored or encouraged the commission of these acts.

5.1.3. Obstacles to the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations

135. 1. Since the adoption of the judgment of the I/A Court H.R. in the case of Barrios Altos v. Peru, the organs of the System have been clear in pointing out that:

amnesty provisions, statutes of limitation and the establishment of exclusions of liability that seek to prevent the investigation and punishment of those responsible for serious human rights violations such as torture, summary, illegal or arbitrary executions and forced disappearances, all of which are prohibited because they contravene non-derogable rights recognized by international human rights law, are inadmissible³⁸⁰ .

136. Prior to this landmark decision, the IACHR had already ruled on the incompatibility of amnesty laws relating to serious human rights violations in decisions on the merits regarding El Salvador, Argentina and Uruguay in 1992³⁸¹ . Previously, in its 1985 Annual Report, the IACHR had expressed its opposition to so-called self-amnesties³⁸².

137. In the context of the supervision of compliance with the sentences in the Barrios Altos³⁸³ and La Cantuta³⁸⁴ cases, the IACHR ruled on the humanitarian pardon granted to Alberto Fujimori, establishing a series of standards regarding the application of pardons in the case of persons convicted of serious human rights violations in transitional contexts. In this regard, it emphasized that: (i) in case of serious human rights violations, not only amnesties but also pardons or reprieves are incompatible with international human rights law; (ii) such figures impede the satisfaction of the victims' right to justice since they have a disproportionate impact on the right to justice and the dignity of the victims and their relatives; (iii) their application is even more serious and reprehensible in the case of crimes against humanity; and (iv) although persons deprived of their liberty have the right to be treated with dignity and to receive adequate medical care, to achieve this end it is not necessary to use the figure of pardon, which implies the extinction of the sentence, but rather there are multiple means that are less harmful to the rights of the victims³⁸⁵.
138. The jurisprudence on the incompatibility of amnesty laws or other similar provisions with the obligations of States to investigate and, where appropriate, punish those responsible for serious human rights violations has been constant to date³⁸⁶.

Cases submitted to the I/A Court H.R.

Application before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Julia Gomes Lund et al. (Guerrilha do Araguaia) (Case 11.552) v. Federative Republic of Brazil. March 26, 2009 (available in Spanish).

185. Consequently, even though Brazil has not ratified the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, the obligation to investigate and criminally prosecute crimes against humanity arises as a norm of jus cogens, which is not born with that Convention but is recognized in it. Therefore, applying the statute of limitations to crimes against humanity is a violation of this mandatory rule that the Brazilian State must comply with³⁸⁷.

186. The Commission emphasizes that the Brazilian authorities, particularly the judicial authorities, have the duty not to apply amnesty, statutes of limitation, or any other rule excluding responsibility for serious human rights violations that constitute crimes against humanity - such as the forced disappearances in the instant case - by virtue of the fact that such crimes are non-amnestible and imprescriptible, regardless of the date on which they were committed.

8. As a consequence of the foregoing, the Inter-American Commission requests the Court to order the State:

a. Adopt all necessary measures to ensure that Law No. 6.683/79 (Amnesty Law) no longer represents an obstacle to the criminal prosecution of serious human rights violations that constitute crimes against humanity;

³⁸⁷ See, mutatis mutandi, I/A Court H.R., Almonacid Arellano Case, Judgment of September 26, 2006. Almonacid Arellano Case, Judgment of September 26, 2006. Series C No. 154, para. 153.

Application before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Barrios Altos (Case 11.528) against the Republic of Peru, June 8, 2000 (available in Spanish).

141. In the case of Barrios Altos, the amnesty laws limited the investigation, criminal prosecution and punishment of those responsible in violation of the obligations of the Peruvian State not only under the American Convention, but also under other international human rights and humanitarian law treaties and international custom, which strictly prohibit extrajudicial executions.³⁸⁸ Extrajudicial executions constitute a crime against humanity for which there is an unrenounceable obligation to punish those responsible for such a crime³⁸⁹.

142. In other words, the Amnesty Laws curtailed the access of the victims' relatives and survivors to truth, justice, and adequate reparations.

³⁸⁸ The right not to be arbitrarily deprived of life is considered a peremptory norm of international law (ius cogens). Cf. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions; Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

³⁸⁹ In this regard, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has made it clear that Article 6(5) of Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, which calls for the granting of "the broadest possible amnesty" after the cessation of internal armed conflicts, cannot be interpreted as supporting amnesty for violations of humanitarian law. Thus the ICRC held as follows: "The travaux préparatoires of Article 6(5) indicate that this provision is intended to encourage amnesty, ... as a kind of release at the end of hostilities for those who were detained or punished merely because of their participation in hostilities. It is not intended as an amnesty for those who have violated international humanitarian law. See Letter of April 15, 1997, addressed by Dr. Pfanner, Head of the Legal Division, International Committee of the Red Cross, Douglas Casseli, Lessons from the Americas, op. cit, (supra n. 110) pp. 306-7 (1996).

Therefore, the IACHR urges the State to move forward with the investigations of the facts related to serious human rights violations or crimes against humanity, identifying, prosecuting and, where appropriate, punishing those responsible; removing and refraining from resorting to figures such as amnesty, pardon, or gradual statutes of limitations and the establishment of exclusions of responsibility, as well as measures that seek to prevent criminal prosecution or suppress the effects of a conviction.

With regard to memory, truth, and justice, the Commission expressed its concern³⁹² over the presentation of a bill before the Senate of the Republic, which proposes to limit the prosecution and punishment of those allegedly responsible for serious human rights violations committed during the civil-military dictatorship³⁹³. The Commission notes with deep concern that the approval of this initiative would result in the reinstatement of the "Law on the Expiration of the Punitive Claims of the State," as well as the application of the statute of limitations to the aforementioned crimes. In this regard, the Commission reiterated to the Uruguayan State its obligation to guarantee that the Expiry Law does not impede or hinder the investigation and eventual punishment of those responsible for serious human rights violations and called on the State to refrain from approving the bill in question³⁹⁴.

IACHR, Annual Report, Chapter IV. A "Human Rights Development in the Region", Uruguay, 2019.

601. 71. pointed out, the unrenounceable nature of this obligation has been recognized in situations that arise in various social processes faced by different countries in the region, without distinguishing between processes of transition from dictatorships to democracy or processes of search for and consolidation of peace.

25. [...] The Commission has also learned that in specific cases the Peruvian Judiciary has decided not to apply the amnesty laws. The Commission considers such actions to be positive, but insists that amnesty laws should be repealed in general, and not left to the discretion of judicial bodies in specific cases.

5.1.4. Reduction of sentences, alternative measures to imprisonment and prison benefits

139. In addition to the scenarios of impunity due to the existence of figures that prevent the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations, countries in transitional contexts have faced situations in which, although there was an investigation and even - in some cases - punishment, it is not proportional to the seriousness of the crimes or the persons responsible do not serve an effective prison sentence.

140. The IACHR has ruled on such situations in the framework of its various mandates. In this regard, it has concluded that the so-called half statute of limitations or gradual prescription is incompatible with the obligation to adequately punish those who committed serious human rights violations³⁹⁸ . Although the Commission considers that certain circumstances may lead to a reduction of the sentence, this requires a more demanding analysis and requirements in terms of the legal right affected, the seriousness of the facts, and the obligation of States to investigate, prosecute and punish serious human rights violations³⁹⁹ .

141. On the other hand, the IACHR has emphasized that the execution of the prison sentence in this type of case is an important aspect of the obligation to investigate and punish, so that States must take into account the seriousness of the crimes when granting prison benefits⁴⁰⁰. In this regard, the IACHR has expressed concern regarding the granting of benefits such as house arrest or parole in cases of persons convicted of serious human rights violations in the context of the Southern Cone dictatorships⁴⁰¹.

IACHR, Report No. 72/21, Case 13,054. Arturo Benito Vega González et al. Chile, April 16, 2021 (available in Spanish).

273. In this regard, the Commission observes that the idea of a progressive decrease in criminal punishment for crimes against humanity simply because of the passage of time and for alleged reasons of legal certainty is largely incompatible with the obligations to adequately punish those responsible for serious human rights violations. In effect, the figure of the half statute of limitations is not suitable to guarantee legal certainty; it does not take into account the gravity of the crimes against humanity, their multiple effects and the need to avoid their repetition; it does not contribute in any way to the truth and clarification of what happened, much less does it take into account the disproportionate effect that such a reduction has on the rights of the victims and their family members⁴⁰² . In this sense, the IACHR held that, in cases of serious human rights violations, "the State must maintain in time the punitive power of the State over conduct whose gravity makes its repression necessary to prevent its recurrence"⁴⁰³ .

prosecute and punish the persons responsible for crimes against humanity.

69. Similarly, the Commission emphasizes that it is the duty of the State to take into account the gravity of such crimes [crimes against humanity] when granting prison benefits to persons who have been convicted of them, highlighting the execution of the sentence as an important aspect of its international obligation to punish the perpetrators.

100. [...] The Commission emphasizes that crimes against humanity have a series of characteristics that are different from other crimes, and States therefore have an international obligation not to leave these crimes unpunished and to ensure the proportionality of the punishment⁴⁰⁵. Although international law admits that certain circumstances may lead to a reduction of the sentence even in cases of serious human rights violations, such circumstances require a more demanding analysis and requirements in terms of the legal right affected, the gravity of the facts, and the obligation of States to investigate, prosecute and punish those responsible for these crimes⁴⁰⁶.

251. In this regard, the Commission considers it pertinent to indicate that in any transitional justice framework, one component for the establishment of a lasting peace is that it be applied as a system of useful incentives for the truth, the individualization and punishment of those responsible, and the reparation of the victims. The IACHR has emphasized that in the application of a transitional justice law, the satisfaction of the truth and reparation components must be rigorously examined as an essential condition for the imposition, for example, of a mitigated sanction⁴⁰⁷. [...]

255. In this sense, although the Inter-American jurisprudence has established the unrenounceability of the obligation to investigate serious human rights violations committed in the conflict, such as extrajudicial executions, torture, forced disappearances or forced displacements, it has recognized, for example, the possibility of proposing the morigeration of the punitive power of the State, specifically through the imposition of attenuated sanctions⁴⁰⁸.

172. The Commission also notes with concern the slowness of the proceedings in Argentina⁴⁰⁹. In this regard, the IACHR expressed its dismay at the jurisprudential changes contrary to Inter-American standards regarding the sanctions applicable to crimes against humanity. The IACHR expressed its concern over the interpretation made by the Supreme Court of Justice that did not take into account the differentiated characteristics and particularities of crimes against humanity, causing a huge setback in the fight against impunity and justice for the victims.⁴¹⁰ [...]

124. Regarding the sanctions provided for by the Amnesty Law, it should be noted that the IACHR has recognized the possibility of imposing mitigated sanctions in the context of transitional justice processes, such as in the Justice and Peace processes⁴¹¹. 5.1.5. Denial and obstruction of justice

142. The obligation of States to investigate is not limited to the persons directly and indirectly responsible for the facts, but extends to the State authorities that denied access to justice or obstructed in any way the judicial processes⁴¹³. In this sense, the obligation to investigate also extends to omissions in the duty to respond to a complaint or those actions carried out to obstruct the proceedings⁴¹⁴. Such actions or omissions may entail administrative, disciplinary or criminal liability, and the State is obliged to take measures to investigate such acts..

(xvi) "initiate disciplinary, administrative or criminal actions, in accordance with its domestic legislation, against the possible State authorities that have hindered and impeded the due investigation of the facts, as well as those responsible for the various procedural irregularities"⁴¹⁷ .

5.1.6. Adoption of differentiated and intersectional approaches

143. In cases in which the victims belong to groups at special risk, the IACHR has made differentiated pronouncements taking into account the particular circumstances of these persons and the greater impact they face in the context of serious violations and transitional justice.

⁴¹⁷ See, inter alia, I/A Court H.R., Case of Myrna Mack Chang v. Guatemala. Case of Myrna Mack Chang v. Guatemala. Judgment of November 25, 2003. For example, the IACHR has emphasized the importance of investigating and punishing all persons responsible for massacres committed against indigenous communities during armed conflicts⁴¹⁸; as well as the aggressions committed against justice operators and defenders who have acted in processes related to grave violations during dictatorships⁴¹⁹. It has also referred to the importance of prioritizing the investigation of serious violations committed against children and adolescents⁴²⁰, considering that the violations against them take on greater dimensions⁴²¹.

9. 381. The forced disappearance of persons violates the fundamental rights of the victims by denying them their legal personality, who are left without legal protection. In the case of children, the fact acquires greater dimensions. Children, unaware of the causes and reasons for their disappearance, are subjected to serious traumas that affect their personal development. The Commission urges the State to comply with its obligations in light of international treaties and the commitments assumed in the Peace Accords, in the sense of investigating the human rights violations committed during the armed conflict, as well as punishing those responsible and compensating the victims.

194. The Commission has repeatedly expressed its concern over the lack of judicial clarification of most of the acts of violence that have affected Afro-descendant communities and caused their displacement in the context of the armed conflict⁴²³. In this regard, the IACHR has stated that "the establishment of the truth of what happened, the serious search for a measure of justice by determining the responsibility of the perpetrators vis-à-vis the victims, and the reparation of the damage caused, far from hindering agreements that could contribute to pacification, constitute basic pillars of its strength"⁴²⁴. The Commission reiterates its concern and will continue to follow up on the situation of the Afro-descendant communities.

5.2. Search for persons and identification and delivery of mortal remains

144. In cases related to the disappearance of persons in the context of internal armed conflicts, dictatorships and authoritarian regimes, States have the obligation to take all necessary steps to investigate what happened and, in so doing, to determine the circumstances and fate of the victims, establish the identity of the persons

These obligations subsist in the face of uncertainty about the facts and the final fate of the victim, as well as in the absence of identification and punishment of all persons responsible⁴²⁶.

145. In particular, the IACHR has indicated that the investigation must be initiated ex officio, without delay and in a serious, impartial, diligent and effective manner⁴²⁷, and in a way that does not depend on the procedural initiative of the victim, family members or private contribution of evidence⁴²⁸. Likewise, States must guarantee the broad participation of the victims' family members in all stages of the process⁴²⁹.

326. Likewise, the State must initiate an exhaustive search for the whereabouts of José Luís Ibsen Peña, followed by the identification of his remains and the delivery to his family members, if applicable. As long as these measures are not carried out, the forced disappearance of the victim and its effects will continue to be prolonged over time.

191. The Court has recognized the right of the victims' family members to know what happened to them and, if applicable, where their mortal remains are located⁴³³ , which constitutes a measure of reparation and therefore an expectation that the State must satisfy for the victims' family members and society as a whole⁴³⁴ . In effect, the delivery of mortal remains in cases of detainees-disappeared is an act of justice and reparation in itself. It is an act of justice to know the whereabouts of the disappeared, and it is a form of reparation because it allows dignifying the victims, since the mortal remains of a person deserve to be treated with respect for their relatives so that they can give them a proper burial.⁴³⁵

157. The Commission took note of the recent criminalization of the crime of forced disappearance by law published on January 21, 2006. With respect to the text of said criminalization, the Commission reminds the Bolivian State that forced disappearance constitutes a multiple and continuous violation of human rights⁴³⁸ and that the lack of information on the whereabouts of the remains of the victims, the lack of knowledge about the circumstances in which the disappearance took place, as well as the absence of identification and punishment of all those responsible, perpetuate the violation and make it current and extensive to the victims' family members. In this sense, impunity constitutes a source of international responsibility of the State within the framework of the conventional obligations to guarantee human rights by investigating and punishing them.

32. [...] Similarly, the IACHR reiterates that with regard to the recovery of bodies, the State must also address with urgency, seriousness and due diligence the bodies in cases in which the victims were thrown into rivers or the sea, or were incinerated in crematoria ovens to leave no trace, as well as take into account the negative impact of the construction of dams in the midst of the conflict and in areas where bodies of disappeared and murdered persons are buried; and mass graves.

6. Non-repetition measures

147. The IACHR has highlighted the intrinsic relationship between truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of non-repetition, and the way in which these components of the transitional process do not replace one another, but rather complement and feed into each other. In particular, guarantees of non-repetition in this type of context are directly related to the adequate and effective adoption and implementation of the other components of comprehensive reparation⁴³⁹. In this sense, it is the comprehensive satisfaction of the standards of truth, justice and reparation that contributes decisively to the non-repetition of serious human rights violations⁴⁴⁰.

⁴³⁹ IACHR, Compendium of the InterAmerican Commission on Human Rights on Truth, Memory, Justice and Reparation in Transitional Contexts, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 121 12 April 2021, para. 4.

148. Therefore, measures of non-repetition transcend the victims and have a transformative vocation. Their purpose is to prevent the commission of future human rights violations and to modify the structural situation that served as a context and fostered the violations in the specific case⁴⁴¹.

149. This section groups the measures to guarantee the non-repetition of the facts into four categories: (i) measures aimed at the adoption, adaptation or repeal of legislation or other regulations; (ii) public policies; (iii) measures regarding the right to the truth; and (iv) training and awareness-raising.

6.1. Measures tending to the adoption, adaptation or repeal of legislation or other regulations

150. The jurisprudence of the IASHR has repeatedly ruled on the duty of States to guarantee the non-repetition of human rights violations through the adoption, adaptation or repeal of legislation or norms. The legal basis for this obligation is found in Article 2 of the American Convention, which establishes the duty of States to adopt such legislative or other measures as may be necessary to give effect to the rights and freedoms recognized in the ACHR⁴⁴².

151. The type of action required on the part of States - whether to adopt, adapt or repeal - will depend on each country's existing legal framework. These measures do not focus exclusively on laws, but encompass everything from regulations to constitutional provisions, as well as guidelines, directives and protocols. Moreover, in addition to the normative aspects, these guarantees of non-repetition are also aimed at the practice and implementation of these norms by the different State authorities, which includes, among others, the adoption of jurisprudence.

⁴⁴¹ IACHR, Compendium of the InterAmerican Commission on Human Rights on Truth, Memory, Justice and Reparation in Transitional Contexts, OEA/Ser.LV/II.173, Doc. 177, 30 September 2019, p. 26.

152. The following is a systematization of measures corresponding to each of the aforementioned categories, i.e.: adoption, adaptation and repeal of legislation or other regulations.

6.1.1. Adoption of legislation or other regulations

153. These measures seek to create regulations to adapt the domestic framework to the American Convention, to other inter-American instruments, and to the standards developed by inter-American jurisprudence. These include: (i) the criminalization of certain crimes as forced disappearance⁴⁴³; (ii) the adoption of domestic mechanisms, particularly in the area of search⁴⁴⁴, and (iii) the adoption of international or inter-American instruments⁴⁴⁵.

6.1.2. Adaptation of legislation or other regulations

154. These types of measures are aimed at bringing the domestic legal framework into line with the American Convention, other inter-American instruments, and with the standards developed by the jurisprudence of the System. Some examples of these measures are: (i) guaranteeing that judicial decisions comply with the principle of imprescriptibility of grave human rights violations⁴⁴⁷ ; (ii) adjusting jurisprudential practices regarding the imprescriptibility of crimes against humanity⁴⁴⁸ , and (iii) ensuring the continuity of judicial proceedings in this area⁴⁴⁹ .

They should also include measures to continue making the necessary efforts to ensure that the investigations of crimes against humanity committed during the dictatorship move forward as quickly as possible and in accordance with the State's international obligations, and to restore the identity of children who disappeared during the dictatorship.

173. [...] The Commission highlights the need for progress in the process of declassification and promotion of access to archives on serious human rights violations, as has been initiated in the case of Bolivia, and urges the States of the region to promote legislative and institutional changes to that end.

6.1.3. Repeal of legislation or other regulations

155. The purpose of these measures is to annul norms that are incompatible with the American Convention, other inter-American instruments, or with the standards developed by inter-American jurisprudence. Special mention should be made of measures aimed at annulling amnesty laws or other provisions that impede the investigation and punishment of serious human rights violations in transitional justice contexts.

156. In this context, the IACHR was the first international body to declare such laws incompatible with human rights and, in particular, with the right to justice of the victims and their family members. As already mentioned, in 1992 the Commission ruled on the matter in decisions on the merits concerning El Salvador, Argentina and Uruguay in 1992⁴⁵⁰. Years later, these decisions gave rise to the emblematic decision of the I.A. Court H.R. in the *case of Barrios Altos v. Peru*⁴⁵¹. Likewise, the IACHR requested the Court to repeal or cease the effects of amnesty laws or similar provisions in the cases of Peru⁴⁵², Chile⁴⁵³, Brazil⁴⁵⁴, El Salvador⁴⁵⁵ and Uruguay⁴⁵⁶.

3. Bring its domestic legislation into line with the American Convention, in order to repeal the General Amnesty Law.

6.2. Public policies

157. With respect to public policy with a human rights approach, the IACHR has understood that:

is the set of decisions and actions that the State designs, implements, monitors and evaluates - based on a permanent process of inclusion, deliberation and effective social participation - with the objective of protecting, promoting, respecting and guaranteeing the human rights of all persons, groups and collectivities that make up society, under the principles of equality and non-discrimination, universality, access to justice, accountability, transparency, transversality and intersectoriality⁴⁵⁷ .

158. With regard to citizen participation in the area of public policies, the IACHR has indicated that such policies allow the definition of problems, the design of the policy, its implementation and evaluation to incorporate the experiences, perspectives and points of view of the persons and groups that are holders of the rights it seeks to safeguard⁴⁵⁸.
159. In particular, and with the aim of achieving substantive equality, the Commission has highlighted the need to design mechanisms and tools under a differentiated approach that address the particular conditions of certain persons, groups or populations in situations of historical discrimination⁴⁵⁹ . Therefore, and based on this notion of equality, the active participation of these persons in the design of public policies that concern them is required⁴⁶⁰.
160. Although public policies can take various forms and are a cross-cutting component of all structural measures, in transitional contexts, there are some that tend to acquire special relevance as a guarantee of non-repetition. In this regard, and in view of their fundamental role in such contexts, the IACHR has addressed the following: (i) public policies for memory; (ii) public policies for institutional strengthening, particularly aimed at search mechanisms, the justice sector and the security forces; and (iii) public policies for the protection of human rights defenders.

⁴⁶⁰ IACHR. Public policies with a human rights approach. OEA/Ser.L/V/II, Doc. 191, 15 September 2018, para. 48.

6.2.1. Public policies on memory

161. The Commission has emphasized the duty of States to develop memory policies as a basis for addressing gross human rights violations past and present⁴⁶¹. These measures must be implemented in coordination with processes of justice and accountability, including the search for truth, the establishment of reparations and the non-repetition of serious human rights violations. In this context, these policies are based on a comprehensive approach that includes the obligation of States to ensure the representation and participation of victims and society, and to adopt differentiated approaches, such as a gender perspective and an intercultural approach⁴⁶².

Country reports

IACHR, Situation of Human Rights in Chile, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 1/22, January 24, 2022 (available in Spanish).

72. In addition, it calls on the State to strengthen public policies on memory aimed at the non-repetition of past human rights violations as a way to move forward with a change in social culture. In this regard, the IACHR finds that memory sites play a central role in this direction⁴⁶³.

⁴⁶¹ IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas", May 27, 2017.

⁴⁶² IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas", May 27, 2017.

IACHR, Situation of Human Rights in Brazil, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 9, February 12, 2021.

402. [...] The Commission also emphasizes that public policies of memory are part of the State's obligations to provide truth, justice, reparation, and measures of non-repetition of serious human rights violations⁴⁶⁴. In this sense, the IACHR urges the Brazilian State to continue with public policies that vindicate and preserve the memory and dignity of the victims, disseminate and preserve historical memory and promote a culture of human rights and democracy.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas", May 27, 2017.

Principle I "Comprehensive approach to memory".

States must ensure a "comprehensive approach to memory," understood as the obligation to adopt public policies on memory coordinated with processes of justice and accountability, including the search for truth, the establishment of reparations, and the non-repetition of serious human rights violations. This approach includes the state's duty to develop memory policies as a basis for addressing gross human rights violations of the past and present; and considers human rights in their universality, indivisibility and interdependence. The "integral approach to memory" includes the obligation of States to ensure the representation and participation of victims and society.

⁴⁶⁴ IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 'Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas', November 9, 2019.

Principle III "Involvement of civil society".

[...] It is essential to adopt decentralized and differentiated measures to overcome geographical, economic, linguistic and gender barriers, among others, in order to encourage the participation of the entire community, particularly groups in vulnerable situations and subject to historical discrimination.

Principle VI "Intercultural and gender approach".

Public policies on memory should respect and promote the construction of the memories of communities, organizations and collectives, based on the recognition of the different cultural visions, conceptions of well-being and development of the various ethnic-cultural groups; as well as the gender approach, tending to the establishment of relations of equity and equality of opportunities and rights.

Principle IX "Design and implementation of memory initiatives".

States must design and implement initiatives aimed at acknowledging and apologizing for the facts related to serious human rights violations, vindicating the memory and dignity of the victims, and establishing and disseminating the historical truth of such facts. Such initiatives may include public acts, educational, cultural or other measures, respectful of interculturality and diversity, and with a human rights and gender perspective, exemplified by the following:

- e. Installation of monuments, signage in public spaces, memorials and museums in recognition of victims, and removal or contextualized amendment of monuments, memorials, museums, shields, insignia and plaques that praise the memory of perpetrators;

h. Removal or contextualized amendment of street names, national currency and public buildings that praise the memory of perpetrators of gross human rights violations;

i. Elimination of patriotic dates and prohibition of official events that celebrate the memory of perpetrators of grave human rights violations;

m. Carrying out campaigns to donate objects and obtain information related to the perpetration of the serious human rights violations that have occurred;

Principle X "Regulatory framework".

In order to guarantee the legal security of sites of memory, States must provide a precise and adequate regulatory framework that regulates their identification, marking, creation or recovery, preservation and sustainable management, ensuring the participation of victims at all stages and in harmony with international standards on the subject.

Such a normative framework may take the form of specific legislation on sites of memory or, subsidiarily, through the declaration of sites of memory as cultural, historical or similar heritage [...].

6.2.2 Public policies for institutional strengthening

162. Institutional strengthening measures are intended to strengthen the State's operational capacity to comply with its human rights obligations. Since its first judgment, the Inter-American Court has pointed out that States have the duty to organize all their governmental institutions and, in general, all the structures through which the exercise of public power is manifested. This, with the objective that they are capable of ensuring legally and in practice the free and full exercise of human rights⁴⁶⁵. According to the IACHR, institutional strengthening in human rights is key to the respect and implementation of inter-American human rights standards⁴⁶⁶.

163. As will be developed, policies in the context of transitional justice tend to address mainly the mechanisms and institutions linked to the search for missing persons, the administration of justice, and order and security.

a) Institutional strengthening in the area of search

164. In transitional contexts where disappearances have occurred frequently or on a massive scale, search efforts should be part of a comprehensive policy on disappearances⁴⁶⁷. As a measure of non-repetition in these scenarios, the Commission has called on States to strengthen the mechanisms and capacities for search, identification, and, if necessary, delivery of mortal remains.

165. To this end, the IACHR has indicated that the States must carry out actions such as: (i) strengthening of human resources⁴⁶⁸ , as well as financial and logistical⁴⁶⁹ , and scientific and forensic resources⁴⁷⁰ ; (ii) coordination of these tasks with the families⁴⁷¹ ; (iii) creation of a genetic information system⁴⁷² ; (iv) design of a search web page⁴⁷³ , and (v) establishment of inter-institutional cooperation articulated with all authorities involved in this task⁴⁷⁴ . recommended "to urgently advance in the elaboration of a national plan for the search of persons⁴⁷⁵".

166. Likewise, the Commission has referred to the importance of having a single registry of missing persons⁴⁷⁶, which should be: public, updated, unified and purged⁴⁷⁷. This will allow the identification of aspects such as: the different groups of victims, the causes and dynamics of enforced disappearances and the patterns of behavior⁴⁷⁸. Similarly, the IACHR has urged that this registry have disaggregated information, among other elements, by age, gender and ethnicity⁴⁷⁹.
167. Finally, based on a differentiated approach, the IACHR has requested the I.A. Court H.R. to "set up a national commission to search for young people who disappeared as children during the armed conflict⁴⁸⁰".

122. In this regard, the IACHR urges the State to strengthen the capacities of the entities in charge of the search and identification activities, ensuring that they have the necessary human, economic, logistical, scientific and other resources, in order to achieve the most efficient investigations to determine the whereabouts of the victims, within the framework of a coordinated action with the families⁴⁸¹. To this end, it is also important to strengthen the inter-institutional cooperation of the different entities involved in this task, as well as the full collaboration of the institutions that may have information relevant to the clarification of the facts. Finally, the IACHR reiterates its recommendation to the

384. In accordance with the foregoing analysis and conclusions, the Commission recommends to the Guatemalan State:

10. Support the management of the National Commission for the Search for Children Disappeared during the Armed Conflict, adopt appropriate legislation for the implementation of its mandate and facilitate the technical and scientific means necessary for the documentation and search for children who have disappeared, been illegally adopted or illegally separated from their families.

84. The IACHR urges the State to redouble its efforts to identify the number of missing persons in accordance with the stipulated conditions and standards, recalling the importance of having a single registry of victims that is publicly accessible, updated, unified and purged with disaggregated information not only in terms of age and gender, but also in terms of ethnicity, people, among other relevant demographic elements [...].

62. [...] the IACHR has referred to the State's obligation to adopt the pertinent measures to guarantee the effectiveness of the Urgent Search Mechanism or any other mechanism that allows for the immediate recovery of disappeared persons and to have a publicly accessible, updated, unified and purged registry of forcibly disappeared persons.

b) Institutional strengthening of the justice system

167. In contexts of transitional justice, justice systems are faced with the great challenge of responding to serious and often massive human rights violations. In order to respond adequately to this demand, the IACHR has recommended various measures aimed at strengthening the response capacity of the justice system. These include the adoption of the following: (i) measures that seek sufficient human and material resources to adequately perform their tasks⁴⁸² ; (ii) mechanisms for the appointment of judges that strengthen independence and impartiality⁴⁸³ , and (iii) structures for better coordination between different judicial bodies⁴⁸⁴ .

106. The IACHR urges the Salvadoran State to ensure that the various bodies of the justice system responsible for the investigation, prosecution and punishment of persons involved in serious human rights violations or international crimes have the necessary human and material resources to carry out their tasks in an adequate, independent and impartial manner, as ordered by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights⁴⁸⁵.

The Inter-American Commission has established that among the guarantees necessary to ensure the adequate and independent fulfillment of judicial functions are the mechanisms for the appointment of judges, stability in their position, and adequate professional training. Likewise, it is required that the courts be autonomous from other branches of government, that is, that they be free from influences, threats or interferences of any origin⁴⁸⁶. These guarantees do not mean that judges will not exercise their functions in accordance with the law and proper accountability, but rather that challenges to their work cannot be motivated by other interests and that the applicable processes must respect due process guarantees [...].

For this reason, the Commission appreciates the creation of the Special Prosecutor's Offices for Human Rights, Journalists and Trade Unionists, as well as the efforts of the Attorney General to obtain adequate resources to carry out a comprehensive restructuring of the Public Prosecutor's Office, and urges the State to provide it with the necessary resources for this purpose.

c) Institutional strengthening of security forces

168. One of the challenges facing countries transitioning to democracy is the legacy of serious human rights violations, which - to a large extent - are committed by the security forces. To address this reality, the bodies of the System have issued measures aimed at changing the structure of these institutions in order to reincorporate them into democratic life. These measures include, for example, the restructuring of the security forces and the separation of those responsible for serious violations, as well as the promotion of clear mechanisms for promotion and dismissal⁴⁸⁷. In addition, as will be developed below⁴⁸⁸, States have been called upon to implement training programs aimed at the forces of law and order.

124. The Commission notes that many people accused of having committed human rights violations during the armed conflict, in violation of the Peace Accords, are still part of the Armed Forces. In fact, the reduction of personnel that took place affected mainly the rank and file and specialists, and not the hierarchical personnel.⁴⁸⁹ Therefore, the Commission urges the State to take the necessary measures to restructure the Armed Forces in order to remove from their ranks those responsible for serious human rights violations and to promote clear mechanisms for promotion and dismissal from military positions.

IACHR, Third Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Paraguay, OEA/Ser./L/VII.110 doc. 52, March 9, 2001.

36. [...] The Commission wishes to point out in this regard that the effective observance of human rights requires a system in which all its members are trained in the principles of a participatory and informed democracy. In this sense, a profound reform of the police and military systems in Paraguay is necessary, including in the training of police and military personnel principles related to democracy and the observance of human rights. At the same time, a profound change is needed in these institutions, which until now have maintained an intricate structure based on chains of command, which often makes it difficult to determine individual responsibility in cases of abuses by its members.

6.2.3. Public policies for the protection of human rights defenders

169. For decades, the IACHR has observed that groups of human rights defenders and social leaders⁴⁹⁰ -whose work has been linked to the denunciation of serious violations related to armed conflict and peace-building- have been exposed to high levels of violence⁴⁹¹ - In this regard, the IACHR has also noted that this situation is aggravated by additional factors of discrimination, such as race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and gender identity and expression⁴⁹².
170. Considering the primordial role that defenders and social leaders play in the processes of justice for victims of serious human rights violations, and in the processes of seeking and consolidating peace⁴⁹³ , the discrimination and violence they face has been of particular concern to the IACHR⁴⁹⁴. It is also noted that family members of victims often assume the role of defenders, acting on their specific cases but with an impact on more structural issues related to human rights. Furthermore, according to the Commission, the acts of aggression committed against those who seek justice in cases of serious human rights violations have shown that the attacks are aimed at ensuring impunity for these violations⁴⁹⁵.

171. In this context, the IACHR has called for efforts aimed at the prevention of violence and protection of these groups, through the development and strengthening of "comprehensive and effective public policies for the protection of human rights defenders in situations of risk⁴⁹⁶". Among other issues, these policies should involve the participation of human rights defenders or their organizations, be promoted at all institutional levels⁴⁹⁷, and pay special attention to those who are in "special conditions of vulnerability⁴⁹⁸".

⁴⁹⁴ In fact, the IACHR has issued several resolutions of precautionary measures, urging the State to protect their work, life and integrity. In this regard, see: IACHR, Resolution 33/23, MC 903-22 - David Mayorga Osorio and José Luis Moreno Álvarez, Colombia, June 12, 2023; IACHR, Resolution 111/21, MC 1113-21 - Abencio Caicedo Caicedo and Edinson Valencia García, Colombia, December 31, 2021; IACHR, Resolution 80/21, MC 491-21 - S.G.R.Q. and his family, Colombia, October 4, 2021, para. 39; IACHR, Resolution 53/21, MC 552-21 - Yiner Hernán Quigüantar Cortés, Colombia, July 15, 2021; IACHR, Resolution 47/2017, MC 261-16 - Daniel Ernesto Prado Albarracín regarding Colombia, November 20, 2017; -IACHR, Resolution 20/17, MC 402-17 - Jair Krischke regarding Uruguay, June 21, 2017; IACHR, Resolution 49/2017, MC 661-16 - Case Ramón Cadena Rámila and family regarding Guatemala, October 20, 2016.

172. Faced with scenarios of increased violence, as part of these policies, and in order to have expeditious institutional response measures, the Commission has called on States to develop institutional protection mechanisms and schemes⁴⁹⁹. Among other requirements, the IACHR has indicated that these mechanisms must be temporary and⁵⁰⁰ suitable⁵⁰¹. In addition, the IACHR has called to ensure that their design and implementation are respectful of ethnically and culturally appropriate and relevant approaches⁵⁰², as well as sexual orientation, and gender identity and expression⁵⁰³.

5. Adopt legislative, institutional and judicial measures aimed at reducing the exposure to risk of human rights defenders who are at risk. In this regard, the State should:

5.1 Strengthen institutional capacity to combat the pattern of impunity in cases of threats and deaths of human rights defenders, through the development of investigation protocols that, taking into account the risks inherent to the work of defending human rights, allow for an exhaustive development of the investigation under this hypothesis.

5.2 Strengthen mechanisms to effectively protect persons whose statements have a relevant impact on investigations and who are at risk as a result of their involvement in the investigation.

5.3 Develop adequate and expeditious institutional response measures that allow for the effective protection of human rights defenders in situations of risk.

This obligation implies implementing policies, programs, and interventions aimed at generating safe conditions for the activity of human rights defenders, especially in areas where the impact of the conflict is greater and therefore require more attention.

222. Likewise, the ethnic approach must be ensured⁵⁰⁵. In the protection schemes for Afro-descendant communities and indigenous peoples, the State must take into account the geographic location, particular needs and special situation that these communities have faced in the context of the armed conflict. For remote communities without access to electricity or satellite signal, it is important to recognize that measures such as panic buttons or cell phones are not useful, and that the simple visit of a state representative in the region or the installation of electric lighting may be more effective in deterring violence. Comprehensive strategies for the implementation of collective protection measures should also be designed⁵⁰⁶.

223. Protection schemes must ensure the inclusion of a differentiated perspective that takes into account the specific vulnerability to violence faced by LGBTI human rights defenders in the process of designing and adopting ⁵⁰⁵ Colombia has a specific protocol for risk assessment in cases of indigenous populations and for cases in which a differential gender approach is required. Colombia has reported on the strengthening of indigenous guards, such as the acquisition of rubber boots, identification vests, command sticks, camping tents; for Afro-Colombian communities living in territories far from the urban area, protection measures have been implemented such as boats with outboard motors so that they can easily react to an emergency, and vehicles specially adapted for unpaved terrain, IACHR, Annual Report 2016 Ch. 1200. By virtue of what has been indicated in this section, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia that:

3. Continue to develop comprehensive and effective public policies for the protection of defenders at risk, with special attention to those groups of defenders who may be in special conditions of vulnerability. As part of this policy, the Commission considers that, in addition to material protection measures, the State should effectively investigate the sources of risk to defenders in order to deactivate them.

5. Develop a public policy aimed at combating impunity for violations of the rights of human rights

(...) The IACHR, the CED and the WGEID emphasize the special gravity of the consequences that women relatives face in their lives when they suddenly have to assume a leading role in the searches and investigations. [In this context, the three international organizations call on States to adopt a comprehensive policy on enforced disappearances aimed at realizing the rights to truth, justice and reparation. Such a comprehensive policy should include an analysis of the multiple adverse effects of this unacceptable crime on family members and relatives. It should be designed and implemented with a differential approach that takes into account the specific needs of the victims, regardless of their gender or sexual orientation, and should consider the economic and psychosocial impact of the disappearance and the search on the families, particularly women. In this regard, the CED Guiding Principles for the Search for Missing Persons (Guiding Principles) refer to the duty of States to take into account and provide the necessary support in the framework of the search process, and require that the search has a differential approach and is carried out with a gender perspective and with adequately trained personnel.

IACHR, Press Release No. 38/23, States must protect the rights of women searching for missing persons, March 8, 2023.

Given pre-existing gender inequalities, and in some cases, the absence of the State, women have taken on the search for missing family members, both in contexts of armed conflict, dictatorships or authoritarian regimes, as well as organized crime. In addition, they experience the economic, social and emotional consequences of the disappearance of their relatives in different ways, and, in addition, they search for the disappeared person in precarious and risky conditions. [...]

In this process, many have become activists, community leaders and human rights defenders, and also dedicate their efforts to accompany and guide other families, participate in social protests, and advocate for legislation, among others. In carrying out these tasks, they face gender-based violence, harassment, intimidation, threats and even murder.

In addition, when the breadwinner is missing, women are suddenly forced to assume the economic support of the family, and to allocate time and resources to the search for their loved one. In addition, the domestic and caregiving tasks traditionally assigned to women further limit the time available to invest in paid activities, for which they are forced to accept low-paid, informal or insecure jobs without social benefits. This results in a serious deterioration of the family's economic situation.

6.3. Right to Truth Measures

173. In the area of reparations, the truth component is often analyzed together with justice measures. However, given that the right to truth is one of the pillars of transitional justice mechanisms, it is useful to consider it separately. This is without losing sight of its relationship with the other pillars, particularly those of justice and measures of satisfaction.
174. In transitional contexts, as will be developed below, the key aspects of the right to truth consist of: (i) the establishment of Truth Commissions, (ii) the dissemination of historical truth and (iii) access to information.

6.3.1. General Aspects

175. On several occasions, the IACHR has referred to the dual dimension of the right to the truth; that is, individual and collective. Regarding the individual dimension, all victims of serious human rights violations and their family members have the right to know the truth of what happened⁵¹³. This dimension derives from the right of the victim and his family members to have ample opportunity to be heard and to act in the judicial proceedings⁵¹⁴. For its part, with respect to the collective dimension, the IACHR has indicated that "society has the inalienable right to know the truth of what happened, as well as the reasons and circumstances in which aberrant crimes were committed, in order to prevent such events from occurring again in the future⁵¹⁵". Therefore, according to the IACHR, the victims of serious human rights violations, as well as their families and society as a whole, have the right to "know the truth about such violations as fully as possible, in particular the identity of the perpetrators and the causes, facts and circumstances in which they occurred"⁵¹⁶ .

176. Likewise, the IACHR has called for strengthening the intersectionality of approaches in establishing the historical truth, taking into account the differentiated and disproportionate impacts on certain populations at special risk⁵¹⁷.

71. [...] The Commission, recognizing that the amnesty law eliminated any judicial possibility of a serious and impartial investigation to establish the alleged crimes and identify perpetrators, accomplices and accessories, invoked its general position on the matter, stating:

One of the few issues on which the Commission does not wish to refrain from expressing an opinion on this matter is the need to shed light on human rights violations perpetrated prior to the establishment of the democratic regime [...] Every society has the inalienable right to know the truth of the system has reiterated that all persons, including the family members of the victims of serious human rights violations, have the right to the truth. Consequently, the members of their families, as well as society in general, must be informed of everything that has happened in relation to these violations.

197. The Court has reiterated on several occasions that everyone, including the family members of victims of serious human rights violations, has the right to the truth. Consequently, the victims' family members and society as a whole must be informed of everything that has happened in relation to such violations ⁵¹⁹ .

IACHR, Report on the Situation of Human Rights in El Salvador, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 278, October 14, 2021.

105. [...] The Commission understands that, although the effective search for the truth is the responsibility of the State, and cannot be made to depend on the procedural initiative of the victim, his or her family members or the private contribution of evidence, the victims must have ample opportunity to be heard and to act in the respective proceedings, which implies that they can make statements, receive information, provide evidence, and make allegations⁵²⁰.

IACHR, Third Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Paraguay, OEA/Ser./L/VII. 110 doc. 52, March 9, 2001.

23. [...] The right to the truth and its corollary, "the duty to remember," are part of a collective right that applies both to the individual and to the society of which he or she is a part, and the aim is to prevent the recurrence of violations in the future. The right to justice entails the obligation of the State to prosecute and punish those responsible for the violations. These obligations derive primarily from the provisions of Articles 1(1), 8, 13 and 25 of the Convention.⁵²¹

124. The Commission has already established that: part of the right to reparation for human rights violations, in its modality of satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition, is the right of every person and society to know the full, complete and public truth about the events that occurred, their specific circumstances and who participated in them. The right of a society to know its past in full is not only a means of reparation and clarification of the events that occurred, but also has the purpose of preventing future violations.⁵²²

111. Similarly, the IACHR calls for strengthening the intersectionality of approaches in the establishment of the historical truth, taking into account that women, the elderly, girls and boys have differentiated and disproportionate impacts, making necessary a holistic and multidimensional approach to the conflict that analyzes variables such as forced displacement, recruitment, selective murder and sexual violence, among others, in relation to the aforementioned populations.

CONSIDERING the right of the victims of serious human rights violations, as well as their families and society as a whole, to know the truth about such violations as completely as possible, in particular the identity of the perpetrators and the causes, facts and circumstances in which they occurred.

6.3.2. Truth Commissions

177. The IACHR has pointed out that truth commissions make it possible to advance in the collective construction of the truth about human rights violations in a complementary manner to judicial processes, considering the historical, social and political context⁵²³. Although these mechanisms do not replace justice measures, they can be a fundamental source of information for judicial processes. In this regard, the IACHR has indicated that in scenarios of impunity, these commissions could function as "a catalyst for judicial action and obtaining justice⁵²⁴". Likewise, such mechanisms can be useful for the elaboration of public policy, in addition to constituting a form of recognition and dignification of the victims⁵²⁵. It is, therefore, a mechanism that dialogues with guarantees of non-repetition and measures of satisfaction.

416. The Commission recalls that truth commissions make it possible to advance in the collective construction of the truth about human rights violations in a complementary manner to the judicial processes and consider the historical, social, and political context⁵²⁶. IACHR, Annual Report, Chapter IV, Honduras, 2012

298. The IACHR has supported the Truth Commissions in the different countries of the hemisphere where they have been created insofar as they represent an adequate mechanism to ensure the right to the truth. In this sense, the IACHR has affirmed that:

The right to reparation for human rights violations, in the form of satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition, includes the right of every person and society to know the full, complete and public truth about the events that occurred, their specific circumstances and those who participated in them. The right of a society to know the full truth about its past is not only a means of reparation and

IACHR, Annual Report, Chapter IV. Honduras, 2010

594. It is essential that the TRC [Truth and Reconciliation Commission] have sufficient resources, personnel and independence to carry out its work effectively. Likewise, it is necessary that in the definition of its regulations, work plan and methodology, the investigation of the allegations of human rights violations that occurred in the context of the coup d'état be incorporated as a central axis of its work. The Commission considers that, given the climate of impunity currently prevailing in the State of Honduras, the effective work of the TRC in this regard is of fundamental importance, since it could act as a catalyst for judicial action and the attainment of justice.

6.3.3. Dissemination of the truth

178. In various pronouncements, the IACHR has referred to the manner of dissemination of the historical truth, which can take various forms. Thus, the Commission has requested that the results of judicial proceedings on grave violations be publicly disclosed so that society may know the truth⁵²⁸. On other occasions, it has called for the creation of radio programs so that family members can recount their experiences to society⁵²⁹. Additionally, the IACHR has referred to the use of other spaces to disseminate the historical truth, such as

6.3.4. Access to information and access to archives

179. The IACHR has been emphatic in pointing out that States have the obligation to order, systematize and make available to victims, judicial authorities and society as a whole, all useful and relevant information for the investigation of serious human rights violations, which applies to transitional contexts⁵³⁴.

180. In this regard, the Commission has stressed that the process aimed at establishing the truth requires the free exercise of the right to seek and receive information, as well as the adoption of the necessary measures to enable the Judiciary to undertake and complete investigations into these violations⁵³⁵.

416. [...] In this sense, the Commission calls on the Brazilian State to guarantee, both to justice operators and to the public, technical and systematized access to such information [investigations of the serious violations committed during the civil-military dictatorship], ensuring the inalienable right of the victims, their families and society as a whole to know the truth about the serious human rights violations⁵³⁶.

30. Given this reality, the right to the truth should not be restricted through legislative or other measures. The IACHR has established that the existence of factual or legal impediments -such as the issuance of amnesty laws- to access to information on the facts and circumstances surrounding the violation of a fundamental right, and which prevent the implementation of judicial remedies under domestic jurisdiction, are incompatible with the right to judicial protection provided for in Article 25 of the American Convention.⁵³⁷ The process aimed at establishing the truth requires the free exercise of the right to seek and receive information, as well as the formation of investigative commissions⁵³⁸ and the adoption of the necessary measures to enable the judiciary to undertake and complete the corresponding investigations.⁵³⁹

37. The Inter-American Commission considers it essential that the so-called "archives of terror," made up of the police archives of the dictatorship, found in 1992 by Dr. Martín Almada, with a court order, be protected and used.⁵⁴⁰ These archives not only contain information about human rights violations in Paraguay during the dictatorship but it has also been pointed out that these:

detail the fate of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Latin Americans secretly kidnapped, tortured and murdered by the right-wing regimes of the 1970s. They also provide a paper trail confirming the existence of a slippery and bloody conspiracy between the services of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay to track down and eliminate political adversaries regardless of national borders. It is now possible to complete the outline of "Operation Condor", as this illicit network was known.⁵⁴¹

⁵⁴⁰ In its observations on the present report, the State noted the following: "It should also be noted that Paraguay has anticipated the recommendation of the IACHR issued on December 9, 1998 at its 101st regular session with respect to access to archives and documents held by the State, particularly in cases of investigations aimed at establishing responsibility for international crimes and serious violations of human rights. As the IACHR is aware, in 1992, in a judicial proceeding requested by Dr. Martín Almada, the "Archive of Terror" was discovered, consisting of a voluminous amount of declassified documents containing information on the violation of human rights in Paraguay between 1954 and 1989 and its connection with Operation Condor, especially during the seventies and eighties. These documents are currently housed in the Information and Archive Center for the Defense of Human Rights under the Supreme Court of Justice and declared universal heritage by UNESCO, an organization that signed an agreement with the Judiciary to preserve and protect the archive, which was included in the Memory of the World Register".

(x) "to guarantee justice operators, as well as society, public, technical and systematized access to archives containing useful and relevant information for the investigation of cases of human rights violations";

239. [...] Recommendations:

5. Adopt the necessary measures to ensure the collaboration of all state institutions in relation to the declassification of documentation and provision of information in judicial or extrajudicial investigative processes underway or to be initiated in the future. In the case of serious human rights violations and breaches of IHL in transnational or regional contexts, States should make every effort to cooperate in the provision of official information to States seeking to investigate, prosecute, and punish such violations.

9. Adopt the necessary measures to classify, systematize, preserve and make available historical archives related to serious human rights violations and breaches of IHL.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas," May 27, 2017.

Principle XV "Accessibility of state archives".

States should ensure public, technical and systematized access to archives containing information useful and relevant to the investigation of serious human rights violations. In particular, courts, extrajudicial commissions of inquiry and investigators should be able to freely consult the archives.

Principle XVI "Restrictions on access to information from state archives".

The handling of information must be carried out under the principle of maximum transparency and good faith. Any limitation to freedom of expression must be previously, expressly, specifically, precisely and clearly established in a law.

Victims of gross human rights violations and their families, as well as society as a whole, have the right to know the truth about past atrocities. Therefore, in no case may a state agency deny authorities investigating human rights violations state information that may help to shed light on such violations.

Especially when it comes to the investigation and prosecution of crimes attributable to the State security forces, the Public Authorities cannot use mechanisms such as State secrecy or national security exceptions to avoid providing the information required by the judicial or administrative authorities in charge of the investigation of pending proceedings.

It should be emphasized that the legislation of the region and the Inter-American System have established the principle that, in cases of investigations into serious human rights violations, exceptions related to national security or international relations are not open to appeal, even when they involve legitimate interests that the State can protect in other contexts.

Likewise, States must have a simple, rapid and effective judicial remedy that, in cases where an authority denies information, determines whether there has been a violation of the applicant's right to information and, if so, orders the body to ensure proper access.

6.4. Training and sensitization

181. In cases and situations related to transitional justice contexts, the IACHR has called on States to design and implement training as a measure of non-repetition of serious human rights violations. In particular, these trainings have been related to general topics of human rights and international humanitarian law⁵⁴²; gross human rights violations⁵⁴³, reparation measures⁵⁴⁴, and treatment of

IV. COMPREHENSIVE REPARATION WITH A GENDER PERSPECTIVE IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE CONTEXTS

183. This chapter addresses the standards developed by the Inter-American Commission on reparations with a gender perspective in contexts of transitional justice. The first part develops some general aspects related to the scope of the strengthened obligations of States in this area, considering the exacerbation of violence and discrimination against women in contexts of armed conflict, dictatorships, and authoritarian and repressive regimes. It also addresses the transformative vocation that reparations must have in this type of situation and details some specific standards applicable to situations of sexual violence. Subsequently, IACHR standards are systematized, and in some cases the I/A Court H.R., which use a gender perspective in reparations in transitional justice contexts. This is based on the classification of reparations measures used in Chapter III.

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

184. The organs of the Inter-American System have been clear in establishing that States have the duty to act with due diligence in cases of discrimination and violence against women, which entails four specific obligations: to prevent, investigate, punish and redress⁵⁵⁴. This obligation applies to acts committed both by State agents and by third parties under the tolerance or acquiescence of the State, and for which the State is directly responsible⁵⁵⁵ . Likewise, the Inter-American Commission has underscored the link between discrimination and violence against women⁵⁵⁶ , as well as against LGBTI persons, recognizing the importance of comprehensively and specifically addressing the different forms of gender-based violence in the contexts of armed conflict, military dictatorships or other oppressive and authoritarian regimes⁵⁵⁷.

185. On the other hand, it has highlighted the "comprehensive nature" of the State's responsibility to act with due diligence to prevent the violation of women's human rights in periods of peace and conflict⁵⁵⁸ . In this regard, the IACHR has recommended that States implement and strengthen measures to comply with the duty of due diligence in contexts of armed conflict, taking into account the exacerbation of violence and discrimination against women in such contexts⁵⁵⁹. differentiated impact requires, on the other hand, reinforced prevention and protection actions on the part of the States⁵⁶⁰.

186. Given the situation of structural discrimination faced by women and LGBTI persons, reparations must have a transformative vocation. That is, they should not only have a restitutive effect "but also a corrective effect toward structural changes that dismantle those stereotypes and practices that perpetuate discrimination⁵⁶¹". This emphasis on transformative reparations-that is, reparations aimed at changing or transforming common practices and discriminatory beliefs-reflects the Inter-American System's attention to the impact of gender notions, stereotypes, and historical discrimination on the perpetuation of violence against women⁵⁶².

187. In cases of human rights violations involving violence and discrimination against women, LGBTI persons, girls and adolescents, it is essential that States carry out an analysis aimed at determining to what extent gender determined, on the one hand, the perpetration of human rights violations and, on the other hand, the differentiated nature of the harm caused to them. According to this analysis, States must implement reparation measures that, under no circumstances, exclude, marginalize or revictimize women, LGBTI persons, girls and adolescents. Likewise, the application of these measures must understand that the violations of their human rights affect them differently than men. Likewise, it is essential that the application of this approach takes into account that not all women, girls and adolescents are the same. In this regard, the Commission has pointed out that "discrimination against women on the basis of sex and gender is indivisibly linked to other factors⁵⁶³". In this sense, States have the duty to consider the different factors of discrimination that they may face, such as their age, race, ethnic origin or economic situation⁵⁶⁴.

1. Gender perspective and intersectionality

188. The Inter-American Human Rights System has emphasized that gender-based violence "is a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between women and men" that is perpetuated by the persistence of discriminatory attitudes and practices against women⁵⁶⁵. As mentioned in Chapter II, the gender perspective is a key tool for combating such discrimination and violence.

189. In contexts of violence, States must "incorporate a gender perspective in the design and implementation of reparations for the benefit of women, girls and adolescents⁵⁶⁶". In this regard, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on torture has stated that "reparations must be determined on the basis of a full understanding of the gender component and the consequences of the harm suffered, and must take into account existing gender inequalities so that they are not themselves discriminatory⁵⁶⁷".

190. On the other hand, when determining the scope and content of reparation, States must take into account cultural differences, breaking with prejudices and stereotypes, especially those that are directed against indigenous peoples and Afro-descendant communities⁵⁶⁸. Hence the importance of consulting the victims on their own concept of reparation, their needs, and the impact that the events have had according to their worldview⁵⁶⁹. Likewise, States should take into account other factors of discrimination that accentuate their situation of risk, so that reparations respond to their particular needs; in addition to ensuring that these women are involved in the design and implementation of reparations⁵⁷⁰.

191. The following is a systematization of a series of standards developed by the IACHR in the framework of its various mandates regarding the application of a gender and intersectional perspective in transitional justice contexts.

181. The States Parties to the American Convention on Human Rights have the obligation to carry out actions to recognize and guarantee the work of women searchers in the prevention and investigation of forced disappearance. They must also guarantee that this work is carried out without obstacles, intimidation, or threats, ensuring the personal integrity of the women searchers and their rights to political participation recognized in the Convention, addressing the historical and cultural obstacles that limit the search, and guaranteeing the permanence of their life project in dignified conditions for the women and their dependents⁵⁷¹. This should be extended to reparations, which should be dictated in a way that does not reproduce gender stereotypes, but rather reflects the ways in which women searchers wish to be represented.

11. Reparatory measures should be oriented to ensure the necessary conditions for these children to enjoy education and an adequate standard of living that will allow them to achieve their full development as human beings.

532. By virtue of what has been indicated in this section, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia that:

3. Guarantee, in practice, the implementation of the differential approach for women, children and adolescents, persons with disabilities, indigenous peoples, Afro-descendants, lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans and intersex persons, and human rights defenders, among others.

923. Based on the information and considerations set forth in this report, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia:

6. Incorporate the voices and specific needs of women affected by the armed conflict, as well as the organizations that represent them, in the design of legislation and public policies aimed at ameliorating the impact of the consequences of the armed conflict on them.

13. Design and adopt policies, with the participation of indigenous and Afro-Colombian women, that consider respect for their culture in order to lessen the effects of the armed conflict. In particular, develop actions aimed at reducing the negative effects of the armed conflict on health, education and justice.

16. Ensure that women directly affected by the conflict and its consequences are incorporated into decision-making bodies aimed at resolving the causes and consequences of the conflict.

1014. Trans women who have had to forcibly leave their places of origin for reasons related to the armed conflict do not always identify themselves as victims of forced displacement, which means that they do not have access to state assistance and reparation measures provided for the general population. In the cases of trans women who do identify themselves as victims of displacement, they also do not seek these measures due to lack of information and in some cases they rule out this possibility from the outset, indicating that these policies do not incorporate differential perspectives that respond to their needs⁵⁷².

1174. On the other hand, in relation to LGBTI defenders, the IACHR has noted that the attacks are framed in a context of violence and structural discrimination that has been aggravated by the armed conflict [...].

233. In the case of Colombian women, it is vital that any process aimed at pacification contemplate the clarification and reparation of acts of violence and discrimination that they have experienced as part of the armed conflict [...] Similarly, the Convention of Belém do Pará urges States to establish the necessary judicial and administrative mechanisms to ensure that women victims of violence have effective access to redress, reparation of damages or other just and effective means of compensation.

236 [...] In this context, it is essential that the State respect the rights of women, as well as those of other vulnerable groups in the clarification and punishment of the acts of violence and discrimination that have occurred, as well as the adequate reparation of the damage caused, through individual measures of restitution, compensation and rehabilitation.

42. Based on the foregoing analysis and conclusions, the Commission offers the following recommendations to assist in this process; specifically, that the State:

6. In connection with the above recommendation, adopt concrete measures and procedures to implement the commitment in the Resettlement Agreement that uprooted groups will participate in decision-making and in the formulation, implementation and monitoring of policies and projects that affect them, at the local, regional and national levels. In this regard, effective participation necessarily requires the dissemination of appropriate information to be used for decision-making.

53. In light of the foregoing analysis and conclusions, the Commission recommends that the State:

10. Ensure that the impact and consequences of acts of violence committed against women during the armed conflict are adequately addressed in the design and implementation of the national reparations plan and other reparations and rehabilitation measures.

Resolutions

IACHR, Resolution 3/2019 "Principles on Public Policies on Memory in the Americas," May 27, 2017.

Principle IX: Design and implementation of memory initiatives

States must design and implement initiatives aimed at acknowledging and apologizing for the facts related to serious human rights violations, vindicating the memory and dignity of the victims, and establishing and disseminating the historical truth of such facts. Such initiatives may include public acts, educational, cultural or other measures, respectful of interculturality and diversity, and with a human rights and gender perspective [...].

Good practices identified

Participation in the formulation of initiatives that have an impact on the investigation, punishment and reparation of acts of violence and discrimination.

Women's participation in the Peace Agreement, Colombia. The inclusion and consultation of women in the negotiations that integrated the Peace Agreement signed in 2016 to put an end to more than fifty years of armed conflict with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), as well as the specific vindication of the rights of women and the LGBTI population in this process, constitutes a good practice worldwide in terms of inclusion of women's rights and gender perspective in a negotiation process of this type.

IACHR, Main Guidelines for a Comprehensive Reparations Policy, OEA/Ser/L/V/II.131, Doc. 1, February 19, 2008.

Recommendation 63. The State should create spaces where victims can have an active participation and influence on how their rights to truth, justice and reparation are fulfilled and protected by the State and that they are granted from their perspective, specific needs and in a non-discriminatory manner.

Recommendation 65. Ensure that women directly affected by the conflict and its consequences are incorporated into decision-making bodies aimed at resolving the causes and consequences of the conflict.

2. Reparations in cases of sexual violence with a gender and intersectional perspective

192. In the particular context of human rights violations involving any form of sexual violence, States have a duty to understand and remedy the obstacles that victims of any gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression or bodily diversity face in accessing means of redress. In this regard, in order to address such obstacles, States must apply a sensitive approach to the specific harms and differentiated impacts that these victims face due to the stigma that is often associated with these types of violations⁵⁹¹.
193. In order to redress victims of sexual violence, States must adopt measures with a transformative vocation, aimed at reforming the context of discrimination that reproduces the problem of sexual violence. This implies the organization of the state structure not only with a view to punishing acts of sexual violence, but also to prevent these acts and duly address the causes and social consequences of the problem⁵⁹². In this regard, the Commission has highlighted the complexity of making reparations to victims of sexual violence in societies where discriminatory sociocultural patterns are still prevalent and in which the profound damage caused -which involves physical, psychological, sexual and patrimonial aspects- is not visualized in judicial practice⁵⁹³.
194. The IACHR has developed specific standards that States must comply with when repairing the harm caused to victims of sexual violence. This, taking into account the specific needs that result from the type of violence, and other needs that should guide the reparation process, such as: (i) the social response, focused on the fact that the process itself should be restorative, not revictimizing and aimed at doing justice, and (ii) the recognition of the harm, that is, that the victim should feel that the social system recognizes the harm that was caused to her and that she is not responsible for what happened⁵⁹⁴.

195. In transitional contexts, the IACHR has emphasized that States have the obligation to ensure that the impact and consequences of acts of violence committed against women are adequately contemplated in the design and implementation of reparation measures⁵⁹⁵.

2.1. General aspects

196. The IACHR has recognized, through its various mandates, the widespread use of sexual violence by state agents as a weapon of war⁵⁹⁶. In this regard, it has referred to the severity of sexual violence against women in transitional contexts, particularly with respect to at-risk populations such as indigenous women, who are the most exposed to this type of violence due to the multiple forms of discrimination they face and the vulnerability of their territory⁵⁹⁷. In cases of forced disappearances of women in transitional contexts, the IACHR has highlighted the differentiated impact of the disappearance due to the particular risk of being victims of sexual violence⁵⁹⁸.

197. Likewise, in cases of sexual violence against women in contexts of armed conflict, the Commission has underscored the need to guide collective reparations with a gender focus, which implies a special and differentiated methodology for the participation of the victims of such violence⁵⁹⁹. Likewise, the Commission has underscored the obligation of States to provide enhanced protection for women victims of sexual violence in access to justice, given the context of discrimination and exclusion they face⁶⁰⁰.

Finally, the Commission recalls that the Inter-American Court in its jurisprudence has referred to the particular violence faced by women in contexts of armed conflict and systematic practice of human rights violations, including a greater risk of being selected not only as fatal victims, but also as victims of sexual violence. 2.2. Investigation and punishment in cases of sexual violence

198. In the framework of its various mandates, the IACHR has reiterated the specific and reinforced obligations of States to investigate, punish and prosecute acts of sexual violence against women, LGBTI persons, girls and adolescents. Among others, the Commission has highlighted the following duties: (i) to promote the investigation; (ii) to immediately, seriously and impartially investigate the facts; (iii) to apply strict due diligence; (iv) to incorporate a gender perspective and specific protocols, and (v) to have authorities in charge who are trained in gender issues⁶¹³. Such investigations should not only aim to determine the responsibilities of all the material and intellectual authors of the facts, but also the responsibilities of those who have denied or obstructed access to justice.⁶¹⁴

On the other hand, possible links between those directly responsible for the sexual violence and their hierarchical superiors should be investigated, as well as the existence of components that would demonstrate discriminatory intent and/or the intent to commit genocide. IACHR has also emphasized that impunity in cases of forced disappearances of women is a source of particular suffering and anguish for family members, especially for sons and daughters⁶¹⁸.

Cases submitted to the I/A Court H.R.

IACHR. Report No. 329/20. Case 12.774 Merits. Patricia Emilie Cuéllar et al. El Salvador. December 29, 2020 (available in Spanish)

66. [...]In this regard, in the instant case, concerning the disappearance of Patricia Emilie Cuéllar and Julia Orbelina Pérez, the IACHR considers that taking into account that the disappearance in this context has a differentiated impact given the particular risk of being a victim of sexual violence, the State has a reinforced duty of due diligence, due to the particular situation of vulnerability that women face in this type of practice. As noted, the authorities have not carried out any investigation to ascertain the truth of the facts or their possible differential impact on the women victims, and the possibility that they were framed in the context of particular affectations of women in the Salvadoran armed conflict. To this end, the Commission notes the importance of the State investigating a possible context that describes the possible violence to which women may have been subjected in the context of the armed conflict and adopting a gender perspective in the investigation of the facts that have yet to be addressed. The Commission highlights the statement of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances that "the adoption of a gender perspective in relation to the right to the truth should make it possible to discover how enforced and involuntary disappearances have affected women at the individual and collective levels".

⁶¹⁸ IACHR. Report No. 329/20. Case No. 12.774. Merits. Patricia Emilie Cuéllar Sandoval, Mauricio Cuéllar Cuéllar Cuéllar and Julia Orbelina Pérez. El Salvador, December 29, 2020.

91. The Commission also stresses the importance of analyzing the impact of the forced disappearance of women on their families, especially on their children. The IACHR emphasizes that the disappearance of women and girls is a form of violence against them. As the Committee of Experts of the MESECVI has also pointed out, this violence "transcends their family because it is considered that it does not allow any cycle to be closed, since the rights violated go beyond the right to a life free of violence, also affecting all the fundamental rights contained in the Convention, including the basic right to life, when the perpetrator or perpetrators take the life of the disappeared woman". In the instant case, the Commission notes that Patricia Emilie Cuéllar left her children at the day care center and did not go to pick them up because she was disappeared. In the case of Julia Orbelina Cuéllar, it is noted that she visited her daughter before her disappearance, went to work and was unable to see her again. Therefore, the Commission observes that the disappearance of the two women had a particular impact on their children.

93. By virtue of the foregoing conclusions, THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS RECOMMENDS TO THE STATE OF EL SALVADOR

4. Continue the criminal investigation for forced disappearance diligently, effectively and within a reasonable time in order to clarify the facts completely, identify all possible responsibilities and impose the corresponding sanctions with respect to the human rights violations declared in this report. This investigation should include the line of investigation related to the participation of state agents in the facts and the persecution of the organization Socorro Jurídico Cristiano in the armed conflict. Likewise, the investigation should address a possible context that describes the possible violence to which women may have been subjected in the context of the armed conflict and adopt a gender perspective in the investigation of the facts regarding Patricia Emilie Cuéllar and Julia Orbelina Pérez.

15. The IACHR has established that the investigation stage in cases of sexual violence is of fundamental importance. Failures at this stage become a potentially insurmountable impediment to the subsequent identification, prosecution, and punishment of those responsible for these acts. Several components of the investigation process are fundamental to comply with the duty of States to act with the required due diligence and to guarantee access to justice for the victims. These include the duty to collect and preserve the corresponding evidentiary material in order to support the criminal investigation necessary to find those responsible; identify possible witnesses and obtain their statements; determine the cause, manner, place and time of the act under investigation; protect and thoroughly investigate the crime scene; and guarantee the right of the victim or his or her family members to collaborate in the investigative process; among other indispensable actions for the eventual punishment of those responsible. It is also necessary for the authorities to collect and consider a set of evidence and the context in which a rape occurs, not only focusing on direct evidence of physical resistance on the part of the victim.

Chapters of IACHR Annual Reports

IACHR, Annual Report, Chapter V. "Follow-up on recommendations made by the IACHR in its country or thematic reports", Colombia, 2021.

In this regard, the Commission recalls that impunity in cases of violence against women sends the message that such violence is tolerated and favors its perpetuation; in this regard, the Commission reminds the State of its duty to act with strict due diligence to prevent, punish, and eradicate all forms of violence against women, and to adopt procedures, judicial mechanisms, and specific legislation to avoid impunity, as established in the Convention of Belém Do Pará. In this line, the Commission urges the State to guarantee access to effective judicial mechanisms, as well as to investigate, prosecute, punish, and provide reparations for acts of sexual violence committed in the context of the armed conflict, observing the duty of strict due diligence and under a gender focus.

261. [...] Nevertheless, the Commission takes note of the allegations of civil society that point to the presence of stereotypes and the lack of a gender perspective in the assessment of the facts and testimonies of the victims, as well as the naturalization and minimization of sexual violence in Order 019 of 2021 issued by the SJP, in the framework of macro case 01, in which members of the former secretariat of the extinct FARC-EP were charged with responsibility for crimes against humanity and war crimes⁶²⁴. Press Releases

IACHR, Press Release No. 049/22, The States of the Americas Must Act to Combat Impunity Around Sexual Violence in Contexts of Conflict or Dictatorship, March 8, 2022

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) urges States to guarantee access to justice for survivors of sexual and reproductive violence committed during periods of internal armed conflict or dictatorships. This should be done in accordance with a gender perspective and strict due diligence, with the aim of reducing impunity, preventing the recurrence of violence and advancing in the consolidation of more democratic and egalitarian societies.

Sexual and reproductive violence, in these contexts, does not occur in an isolated or extraordinary manner; it is the result of the aggravation of a continuum of violence that derives from historical and structural discrimination, rooted in the patriarchal and machista culture, which subordinates them under stereotypical notions of inferiority. The same is potentiated when other intersectional factors of vulnerability are present, and manifests itself in various forms, such as rape, sexual torture, forced prostitution, forced pregnancies or abortions, forced sterilizations, forced unions and sexual and/or domestic slavery. [...]

Given the complexity of transitional contexts, the duty of due diligence requires taking into account the framework of systematic and generalized violence in which sexual violence occurs. This should make it possible to unravel the structures that facilitated the violations, not only to punish the immediate perpetrators. [...]

On this occasion, the Inter-American Commission urges States to investigate, prosecute and punish sexual and reproductive violence against women in contexts of conflict or dictatorship as a serious human rights violation, not only as a collateral or secondary fact. The priority, proactive and specific investigation of sexual violence, in addition to making visible the magnitude and systematicity of these acts, allows exposing the discriminatory cultural patterns that give rise to them, as well as the collective reflection necessary to achieve structural transformations. Thus, guaranteeing access to justice and reparation with a transformative vocation are key elements to avoid the repetition of gender-based violence against women and to move towards democratic and egalitarian societies.

2.3. Rehabilitation in cases of sexual violence

201. In cases of sexual violence, rehabilitation measures are a fundamental component of comprehensive reparation. Such measures acquire special relevance as they are a tool that allows the victim to reestablish her trust in society and in state institutions⁶³⁰.

Thematic reports

IACHR, Access to Justice for Women Victims of Sexual Violence in Mesoamerica, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 63, 9 December 2011

29. The States must guarantee the victims of sexual violence mechanisms for physical and psychological reparation for the harm caused, through the services provided by health and other institutions that guarantee comprehensive reparation for the woman victim. To this end, States should consolidate these institutions so that they can provide quality care to the victim.

⁶³⁰ IACHR, Access to Justice for Women Victims of Sexual Violence in Mesoamerica, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 63, December 9, 2011, para. 292.

292. The objective of reparation in cases of sexual violence should be not only to accredit the act denounced and criminally punish the perpetrator, but also to oblige the aggressor to make reparations to the victim, but more importantly, the State should help the victim to face the consequences of the violence experienced; for which it will be necessary to provide tools to recover her dignity as a person, rebuild her self-esteem and restructure her personality. Only in this way will it be possible to restore their trust in society and State institutions. [...]

B. TYPES OF REPAIRS

202. In transitional justice contexts, States must implement reparations measures that actively make visible the gravity and remedy, to the greatest extent possible, human rights violations based on the gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, and bodily diversity of the victims. Likewise, in accordance with the transformative vocation of reparations, the reparations measures implemented with this perspective should be aimed at remedying the conditions of discrimination based on these factors, when they have been the cause of the violations⁶³¹.

203. Given the categories of reparations measures used in the previous chapter, this section will address those measures in which the IACHR has applied a gender perspective in transitional contexts. Each section begins with a brief analysis of the specific aspects pointed out by the IACHR regarding the gender approach, followed by a systematization of the main standards related to the specific reparation measure⁶³².

1. Restitution measures with a gender and intersectional perspective

203. The IACHR has referred to the disproportionate impact that internal displacement has on women, especially women heads of household, pregnant women and women who have been victims of various forms of violence⁶³³. Based on this, it has requested States to adopt restitution measures with a differentiated approach to return to the place of origin and land restitution in the case of female victims.

4. Take additional measures--in accordance with the commitment of the Resettlement Agreement to pay special attention to female-headed households, and the provisions of the Social Fund Law to support the right of women to own land, and to be co-owners with their husbands or partners, including measures to train officials working in this area, and to promote awareness of and respect for this right among local populations. For this right to be effectively exercised, the State must strengthen its efforts to provide women with access to credit and development projects.

2. Compensation measures with a gender and intersectional perspective

204. In cases involving female victims, when determining compensation measures, the bodies of the System have taken into account the specific economic needs, particularly when the victim is a female head of household. For his part, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-recurrence has pointed out that it must be ensured that the standards and parameters used in the identification and quantification of this type of reparations "do not rest on sexist preconceptions and that the secondary effects are duly assessed in [these] measures [...]”⁶³⁴”

110. Regarding the loss of income at the time of the facts, in addition to her political activities, as a primary school teacher, she performed some lucrative work such as giving private classes. As the victim will be able to explain directly to the Court, being forced to leave her country to protect her life and to seek protection as a refugee in another country, she had to change her plans and life project. Since she was unable to find work as a teacher in Mexico, the economic needs, typical of a woman head of household, forced her to perform cleaning tasks and finally to work as a receptionist for an engineering firm. In this regard, without prejudice to the specific claims that the representatives of the victim may submit to the Court, the Court requests that this aspect of the compensation for material damages be assessed in equity.

3. Satisfaction measures with a gender and intersectional perspective

205. The IACHR has referred, in general terms, to the need to adopt a gender perspective in the implementation of measures of

Country reports

IACHR, Violence and Discrimination against Women in the Armed Conflict in Colombia. OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc. 67, October 18, 2006

The Commission urges the States to comply fully with the recommendations that involve measures of satisfaction for the benefit of victims of discrimination and violence against women, adolescents, and girls and to encourage their participation in the process of determining such measures. The IACHR recalls that these measures must be adopted with a gender perspective, taking into account the individual and cultural circumstances of the victim⁶³⁶.

4. Rehabilitation measures with a gender and intersectional perspective

206. The IACHR has developed specific standards on rehabilitation measures for women victims of gender-based violence. The Commission's experience shows that the design and implementation of rehabilitation measures depends to a large extent on the nature of the facts denounced and the recipients of the measures⁶³⁷. In this regard, through friendly settlement agreements, States have committed to provide psychotherapeutic care to persons

In this regard, reference has been made to the positive impact of rehabilitation measures on the empowerment and autonomy of women, and to their transformative nature⁶³⁹. The IACHR has also highlighted the need for this type of program to recognize the harm suffered and the specific needs of women, taking into account the different intersectionalities⁶⁴⁰.

207. On the other hand, in transitional contexts, the IACHR has referred to the needs of those populations of women who are particularly affected, such as displaced women and Afro-descendants. In this regard, it has recommended that States adopt actions for comprehensive and multidisciplinary care that adequately addresses their short and long-term needs, both in terms of health ⁶³⁸ On March 9, 2007, through Friendly Settlement Report No. 21/07, the Commission approved a friendly settlement agreement in the Case of Paulina del Carmen Ramírez Jacinto. In summary, the petitioners alleged that on July 31, 1999, when Paulina del Carmen Ramírez Jacinto was fourteen years old, she was the victim of a rape perpetrated in her home. The incident was immediately reported to the Office of the Public Prosecutor Specializing in Sexual Crimes and Domestic Violence. The petitioners alleged that the Public Prosecutor's Office did not inform Paulina del Carmen Ramírez Jacinto or her mother about the existence of emergency oral contraception, and the rape resulted in a pregnancy. They also denounced that the authorities allegedly put up various administrative and psychological barriers to prevent Paulina del Carmen Ramírez Jacinto from deciding to have an abortion, since rape is one of the exceptions in which abortion is not penalized. The friendly settlement agreement established the State's commitment to provide psychological care to Paulina del Carmen Ramírez Jacinto and her son by specialists from the Mental Health Center of the Baja California State Health Secretariat. 91. The Commission also stresses the importance of analyzing the impact of the forced disappearance of women on their families, especially on their children. The IACHR emphasizes that the disappearance of women and girls is a form of violence against them. As the Committee of Experts of the MESECVI has also pointed out, this violence "transcends their family because it is considered that it does not allow any cycle to be closed, since the rights violated go beyond the right to a life free of violence, also affecting all the fundamental rights contained in the Convention, including the basic right to life, when the perpetrator or perpetrators take the life of the disappeared woman". In the instant case, the Commission notes that Patricia Emilie Cuéllar left her children at the day care center and did not go to pick them up because she was disappeared. In the case of Julia Orbelina Cuéllar, it is noted that she visited her daughter before her disappearance, went to work and was unable to see her again. Therefore, the Commission observes that the disappearance of the two women had a particular impact on their children.

923. Based on the information and considerations set forth in this report, the Commission recommends to the State of Colombia:

11. Design and implement a policy with positive actions to recognize and enforce women's rights in terms of comprehensive and multidisciplinary care and support in health, justice, education and economic matters for displaced women, which adequately addresses their needs in the short and long term.

When the beneficiaries of rehabilitation measures are women severely affected by human rights violations perpetrated against them because of their gender, rehabilitation measures are very effective in empowering them, increasing their autonomy and changing the situation of discrimination that led to those violations⁶⁴³ , always prioritizing the particular needs and wishes of the victims⁶⁴⁴ . factors⁶⁴⁵. In addition, the beneficiaries of rehabilitation measures could be indirect victims who have been affected by human rights violations perpetrated against women, girls and adolescents, such as their family members, which reaffirms that the serious effects of human rights violations are not limited to the direct victims, but have repercussions on their family and society as a whole.⁶⁴⁶

87. When granting rehabilitation measures, States should consider the greater duty to protect women, girls and adolescents and the importance of granting measures in accordance with the particularities of this group⁶⁴⁷. Rehabilitation programs should take into account that human rights violations have differentiated effects on women, girls and adolescents, so that these measures should recognize the damages suffered and the specific needs, according to their race, ethnic origin, religion or beliefs, health, social status, age, class, caste, sexual orientation and gender identity⁶⁴⁸ [...].

Only in this way will it be possible to restore their trust in society and State institutions. [...]

B. Repairs

Reparations for victims of sexual violence

29. The States must guarantee the victims of sexual violence mechanisms for physical and psychological reparation for the harm caused, through the services provided by health and other institutions that guarantee comprehensive reparation for the woman victim. To this end, States should consolidate these institutions so that they can provide quality care to the victim.

280. [...] the Commission calls on the State to ensure that women have access, free of charge and without discrimination, to specialized physical and mental health services that take into account the differentiated impacts of the armed conflict on women's lives and bodies, especially in regions traditionally dominated by armed actors, as a form of reparation and rehabilitation of their fundamental rights.

With regard to the tenth recommendation aimed at guaranteeing that the impact and consequences of the acts of violence committed against women during the armed conflict are adequately contemplated in the design and execution of the national reparation plan and other reparation and rehabilitation measures, the Commission notes as a positive step that the National Reparations Program (PNR) contemplates special attention to victims of sexual violence who request it and according to their particular needs. Likewise, it will be coordinated with other governmental and civil society agencies to promote policies aimed at providing permanent attention to victims of sexual violence.

101. The IACHR has emphasized that for women, this decision is of utmost importance since the Court expressly establishes "the importance of consulting the opinion of women in the definition of humanitarian assistance programs, the need to overcome the welfarist vision that reinforces or reproduces discriminatory practices against women [...]".

5. Measures in the area of justice with a gender and intersectional perspective

208. This section will present those justice measures in which the IACHR has made considerations with a gender perspective. First, the measures related to the obligation to punish are detailed, with special emphasis on the duty of enhanced due diligence and, secondly, those related to the search for persons.

5.1. Investigation and sanction

209. As indicated at the beginning of this chapter, the organs of the Inter-American System have been clear in establishing that States have the duty to act with due diligence in cases of discrimination and violence against women, which entails, among others, the obligation to investigate and punish⁶⁴⁹. Such investigation must be carried out immediately, seriously and impartially, with strict due diligence and applying a gender and intersectional perspective⁶⁵⁰.

210. The following is a systematization of some standards and criteria related to the application of a gender perspective in the investigation and punishment of transitional contexts. These standards are structured in three points: (i) general aspects; (ii) due diligence and gender perspective; and (iii) search for persons.

5.1.1. General Aspects

211. Among the standards developed in this area, the importance that the IACHR has given to the need to consider intersectional aspects when investigating the facts stands out. In this regard, the IACHR has referred, among others, to the particular situation of displaced women, Afro-descendants, pregnant women, and heads of household⁶⁵¹. Regarding the obligation to punish, the IACHR has referred to the importance that investigations into serious violations of women's human rights result in the effective punishment of those responsible and in comprehensive reparations for the victims⁶⁵².

The Commission also established that Denise Peres Crispim was also a victim of arbitrary detention and torture. Furthermore, taking into account that the victim was pregnant, the Commission analyzed the facts in light of the international standards applicable to the rights of pregnant women deprived of their liberty. In this regard, it emphasized that her pregnancy constituted a condition of particular vulnerability, so that the arbitrary deprivation of liberty and torture generated an even more disproportionate affectation, as well as the affectation of other rights.

Consequently, the Commission requests the Inter-American Court to establish the following measures of reparation:

3. Investigate in a serious, diligent and effective manner and within a reasonable period of time the facts related to the arbitrary detention, torture and murder of Eduardo Collen Leite; as well as the arbitrary detention and torture of Denise Peres Crispim, in order to identify those responsible for such violations and punish them criminally. In particular: [...]

(f) it shall conduct the investigation into the events that occurred to Mrs. Denise Peres Crispim with a gender perspective and taking into account that what occurred against her constituted a form of violence against women, especially aggravated in view of the fact that she was pregnant at the time of the events.

IACHR. Report No. 64/11. Case 12.573. Merits. Marino López et al. (Operation Genesis). Colombia. March 31, 2011.

Recommendations:

1. Conduct a complete, impartial, effective and prompt investigation of the facts in order to establish and punish the intellectual and material responsibility of all persons who participated in the events that caused the forced displacement of the Afro-descendant communities of Cacarica associated with CAVIDA, of the women heads of household living in Turbo and to determine responsibility for the lack of effective investigation that has resulted in the impunity of the facts. This investigation should be carried out from the perspective of the affected group and take into consideration the form of discrimination they suffer.

921. The situation of risk, threats, harassment and violence faced by women defenders of women's rights in Colombia and their families has been extensively documented by the IACHR in its 2006 report - Women Facing Violence and Discrimination Derived from the Armed Conflict in Colombia - and the follow-up report published as part of Chapter V of the 2009 annual report. The Commission reiterates the need for the State to duly investigate and punish threats and attacks against women defenders of women's rights to ensure that these abuses do not culminate in impunity.

265. At the same time, given the persistence of these challenges to justice and the high rates of impunity, the IACHR reiterates its recommendations and calls on the State to take the necessary measures to effectively comply with these orders and to continue its efforts to ensure access to justice for women victims of human rights violations in the context of the armed conflict. The Commission also reiterates the State's duty to investigate, clarify, prosecute, try and punish serious violations of women's human rights and the importance of redoubling efforts in the fight against impunity in relation to the progress of investigations that result in the effective punishment of those responsible and comprehensive reparation for the victims.

5.1.2. Due diligence and gender and intersectional perspective

212. The organs of the Inter-American System have reiterated the reinforced duty implied in the investigation of serious human rights violations committed against women, particularly in transitional contexts, and the need to apply a gender focus⁶⁵⁶. In this regard, the IACHR has emphasized that such an investigative approach cannot depend on the intention of the perpetrator⁶⁵⁷.

213. In addition to the application of a gender perspective, due diligence implies that the investigation be exhaustive, impartial, and effective, that it be carried out within a reasonable time, and that the specificity of the violence suffered be considered in the case of intersectionalities⁶⁵⁸. In the case of women journalists, the bodies of the System have emphasized the double dimension of strict scrutiny in the investigation: because they are women victims of gender-based violence and because of the obligation to protect journalists who, due to the exercise of their profession, are at special risk⁶⁵⁹.

B.2.2.2 Regarding the determination of criminal liability

128. [...] At the public hearing [the IACHR] affirmed that the investigation of extrajudicial executions did not "take into account a gender focus and the reinforced duty implied by the investigation of this type of violence"⁶⁶⁰.

156. The Court has indicated that Article 7(b) of the Convention of Belém do Pará specifically obliges States Parties to use due diligence to prevent, punish and eradicate ⁶⁶⁰ In this regard, the Commission recalled that "Silvia Reyes [...] was in the third trimester of her pregnancy", that "the wounds on the bodies of the victims showed special training with multiple bullet wounds" and that "there is evidence that at least one of them was naked". It considered that the extrajudicial executions of the three women were carried out with "particular cruelty". The Commission understood that it was not an obstacle to the duty to adopt a gender perspective to assume, as a hypothesis regarding the facts to be investigated, that the executions took place without the perpetrators being aware of the persons they were shooting at, or whether or not they were women, since they would have acted against anyone who was inside the house, without seeing which persons they were attacking. In this regard, it stated that "[the] gender focus of the investigation does not depend on the intention of the perpetrator".

violence against women⁶⁶¹. When faced with an act of violence against a woman, "it is particularly important that the authorities in charge of the investigation carry it out with determination and effectiveness, taking into account society's duty to reject violence against women and the State's obligations to eradicate it and to provide victims with confidence in State institutions for their protection"⁶⁶²

157. The Court notes what was stated by the Specialized Prosecutor in his oral testimony at the public hearing (supra paras. 8 and 27), who explained that the gender perspective "was not analyzed" because "what took place in this case was simply an execution of the persons who were inside the house without the perpetrators being aware that they were women or not. Despite the foregoing, there are statements that point to the possibility that the soldiers could have noticed that there was a pregnant woman in the house, and that the three women were shouting to please not kill them, which suggests that the perpetrators could have imagined that they would attack women (supra para. 56 and footnote 46). There were also allegations that the body of one of them was found naked (supra para. 58), with no record of any inquiry into the circumstances of why she was found that way.

158. Given the foregoing, the Court understands that it cannot be ruled out a priori that acts of gender violence may have occurred in the case, and that this should have been specifically investigated. From the assertions of the Specialized Prosecutor it is clear that no investigation has been carried out in this regard. This constitutes a negligent omissive conduct contrary to the duty to punish acts of violence against women. Therefore, the State failed to comply with Article 7.b of the Convention of Belém do Pará.

I/A Court H.R., Case of Bedoya Lima et al. v. Colombia. Merits, Reparations and Costs. Judgment of August 26, 2021. Series C No. 431.

126. The Court further considers that, in cases of investigation of acts of violence directed against women journalists, the duty of due diligence must be subjected to strict scrutiny for two reasons. First, because States have a positive obligation to guarantee freedom of expression and to protect persons who, because of their profession, find themselves in a special situation of risk when exercising this right⁶⁶³. Second, because to this duty should be added the standard of enhanced due diligence with respect to the prevention and protection of women against gender-based violence⁶⁶⁴. This must be taken into account from the beginning of an investigation of violent acts directed against them in the context of their journalistic work and entails the obligation to identify and investigate with due diligence the special and differentiated risks faced by women journalists due to their profession and gender⁶⁶⁵, as well as the factors that increase the possibility of them being victims of violence⁶⁶⁶. To the foregoing is added the obligatory presumption, from the beginning of the investigations, that the acts of violence could have a link to their journalistic work⁶⁶⁷. In sum, the Court considers it essential to emphasize that, when investigating acts of violence directed against women journalists, States have the obligation to adopt all measures necessary to approach the investigation from an intersectional perspective that takes into account these different axes of vulnerability that affect the person in question, which, in turn, motivate or enhance the enhanced diligence.

⁶⁶³ The Court has emphasized that freedom of expression, particularly in matters of public interest, "is a cornerstone in the very existence of a democratic society," such that, "without an effective guarantee of freedom of expression, the democratic system is weakened and pluralism and tolerance are undermined; the mechanisms of citizen control and denunciation may become inoperative and, ultimately, a fertile ground for authoritarian systems to take root. Cf. Advisory Opinion OC-5/85, para. 70, and Case of Carvajal Carvajal et al. v. Colombia, supra, para. 174.

⁶⁶⁴ Cf. Case of González et al. ("Campo Algodonero") v. Mexico, supra, para. 358, and Case of López Soto et al. v. Venezuela, supra, para. 209.

134. The Court recalls that, in cases of violence against women, the general obligations established in Articles 8 and 25 of the American Convention are complemented and reinforced for those States that are Parties, by the obligations derived from the specific inter-American treaty, the Convention of Belém do Pará. Article 7.b of the Convention specifically obliges States Parties to use due diligence to prevent, punish and eradicate violence against women. Thus, when faced with an act of violence against a woman, whether committed by a State agent or by a private individual, it is especially important that the authorities in charge of the investigation carry it out with determination and effectiveness, bearing in mind society's duty to reject violence against women and the State's obligations to ⁶⁶⁶ The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women, its causes and consequences, in her report "Eradicating Violence against Women Journalists" A/HRC/44/52 of May 6, 2020, concluded and recommended that States "Address the factors that increase the likelihood that women journalists will experience violence and harassment in the world of work, such as discrimination, abuse of power relations and the existence of cultural and social norms that support violence and harassment, and create internal mechanisms against sexual harassment in the workplace." eradicate it and to provide victims with confidence in State institutions for their protection⁶⁶⁸.

135. Likewise, the Court has indicated in its reiterated jurisprudence that criminal investigations must include a gender perspective and be carried out by officials trained in similar cases and in dealing with victims of gender-based discrimination and violence⁶⁶⁹. The Court recalls that judicial ineffectiveness in individual cases of violence against women fosters an environment of impunity that facilitates and promotes the repetition of acts of violence in general and sends a message that violence against women can be tolerated and accepted, which favors its perpetuation and social acceptance of the phenomenon, the feeling and sensation of insecurity of women, as well as their persistent distrust in the system of administration of justice⁶⁷⁰. Such inefficiency or indifference in itself constitutes discrimination against women in access to justice. Therefore, when there are concrete indications or suspicions of gender-based violence, the failure of the authorities to investigate the possible discriminatory motives behind an act of violence against women may in itself constitute a form of gender-based discrimination⁶⁷¹.

1. Complete prompt, thorough, impartial, and effective investigations of the violations described in this report. These investigations should be carried out within a reasonable period of time and without delay by the judicial authorities, with a view to clarifying the truth and punishing those responsible. These measures should also be implemented considering the specificity of the violence suffered by the women defenders affected, the discrimination that affects them based on their dual status as leaders and women, and the known context of risk in which they work. Thematic reports

IACHR. Violence and discrimination against women in the armed conflict in Colombia. OEA/Ser.L/V/III. Doc. 67, October 18, 2006

221. In the past, the IACHR has recommended to the Colombian State that it act with due diligence to ensure that all cases of gender-based violence and discrimination are subject to timely, complete and impartial investigative measures, as well as adequate punishment of those responsible and reparations for the victims⁶⁷² [...].

5.2. Search for persons with a gender and intersectional perspective

214. Regarding the search for persons in transitional contexts, the general standards already systematized in Chapter III apply. Additionally, the Inter-American System has developed specific standards regarding the search for missing women, in which case there is an obligation of strict due diligence due to the greater risk that, due to their gender, they may be victims of different types of violence, including sexual violence. In this regard, the Inter-American Court has pointed out that in a generalized context of violence and discrimination against women:

[...] a duty of strict due diligence arises in the case of reports of missing women, with respect to the search for them during the first hours and days. This obligation of means, being stricter, requires exhaustive search activities to be carried out. In particular, it is essential that the police, prosecutorial and judicial authorities act promptly and immediately, ordering timely and necessary measures aimed at determining the whereabouts of the victims or the place where they may be deprived of their liberty. There must be adequate procedures for complaints and these must involve an effective investigation from the first hours. The authorities should presume that the missing person is deprived of liberty and is still alive until the uncertainty as to his or her fate is resolved⁶⁷³.

215. Recently, the I.A. Court H.R. has expressed its opinion on the work of women searchers and the protection of their rights in this role⁶⁷⁴ :

In addition, it is worth recalling what this Court has stated in the sense that the States Parties to the American Convention on Human Rights have the obligation to carry out actions to recognize and guarantee the work of women searchers in the prevention and investigation of forced disappearance. They must also guarantee that such work is carried out without obstacles, intimidation or threats, ensuring the personal integrity of the women searchers and their rights to political participation recognized in the Convention, addressing the historical and cultural obstacles that limit the search, and guaranteeing the permanence of their life project in dignified conditions for the women and their dependents⁶⁷⁵. This should be extended to reparations, which should be dictated in a way that does not reproduce gender stereotypes, but rather reflects those ways in which women searchers wish to be represented⁶⁷⁶.

216. In order to adequately prevent gender-based violence, the obligation to search for missing women and girls is more rigorous and requires an immediate and effective response from the authorities receiving the report⁶⁷⁷. This includes a thorough search, and requires that the authorities in charge of receiving complaints have the capacity and sensitivity to understand the phenomenon of violence against women, as well as the will to act immediately⁶⁷⁸. Likewise, taking into account the structural nature of gender-based discrimination that underlies all forms of violence against women, it is essential to incorporate the gender perspective in a cross-cutting manner in the analysis and approach to the phenomenon of missing women, in terms of causes, dynamics and consequences⁶⁷⁹. In addition, the IACHR has highlighted efforts to consolidate unified registries of missing persons with information disaggregated by gender and has urged States to continue these efforts⁶⁸⁰.

217. The aforementioned standards also apply to transitional justice contexts. Recently, the IACHR has begun to highlight the role of women searching for disappeared persons. On International Women's Day, the Commission recognized and highlighted the leadership of women in the search for and defense of human rights in situations of forced and involuntary disappearance of persons, and called on States to comprehensively protect and guarantee the exercise of their rights, as well as their work in the search for and defense of human rights, with a focus on gender and intersectionality. In this regard, the Commission stated⁶⁸¹:

Given pre-existing gender inequalities, and in some cases, the absence of the State, women have taken on the search for missing family members, both in contexts of armed conflict, dictatorships or authoritarian regimes, as well as organized crime. In addition, they experience the economic, social and emotional consequences of the disappearance of their relatives in different ways, and, in addition, they search for the missing person in precarious and risky conditions.

218. The women carry out searches in hospitals, detention centers, rehabilitation clinics, etc., as well as in the field and in clandestine graves. In this process, many have become activists, community leaders and human rights defenders, and also dedicate efforts to accompany and guide other families, participate in social protests, and advocate for legislation, among others. In carrying out these tasks, they face gender-based violence, harassment, intimidation, threats and even murder.

219. In addition, when the person responsible for household maintenance is missing, women are suddenly forced to assume the economic support of the family, and to allocate time and resources to the search for their loved one. In addition, the domestic and caregiving tasks traditionally assigned to women further limit the time available to invest in paid activities, for which they are forced to accept low-paid, informal or insecure jobs without social benefits. This results in a serious deterioration of the family's economic situation.
220. Likewise, women's participation and leadership in search efforts and judicial processes entails high physical and emotional overloads that put their health at risk. Time constraints also make self-care difficult, particularly food, rest and recreation, as well as access to medical care. They are more likely to experience constant feelings of frustration and despair during the search, as well as suffering and pain due to the lack of justice. They also face rejection and stigmatization from their family or community, and their own feelings of worry and guilt, as they feel that they are neglecting their children or other persons under their care because they are engaged in the search.
221. The Commission recognizes that women's actions in the search for truth and justice are key in the discovery of missing persons, in the advancement of investigations, and in the adoption of public policies and structural reforms in this area.
222. The IACHR urges the States to adopt comprehensive protection measures that take into account the particular needs and specific risks faced by women in the search for and defense of human rights. It also reiterates the call to adopt and implement a comprehensive policy on enforced disappearances that addresses the differential impact on the rights of women relatives of disappeared persons; and to ensure that they have a leading role in the design of the policy. The above, through the issuance of a regulatory framework that includes, in particular, the access of women searchers to health services, social security and psychosocial support with a gender perspective and intersectionality.

223. On the other hand, in the public hearing held on October 12, 2023 in the Case of Leite de Souza et al. v. Brazil before the Inter-American Court, the IACHR in its concluding observations referred to the important work of the searching mothers⁶⁸². In this regard, it recognized and highlighted the leadership that women have assumed in the search for their sons and daughters and other family members who are victims of forced disappearance. She also stressed the high physical and emotional overload of this work, which they often carry out in precarious and risky conditions, being threatened and assaulted. It also indicated how these women have experienced the economic, social and emotional consequences of the forced disappearance in different ways. In relation to the reparations requested from the I.A. Court H.R., the Commission emphasized, among the measures of non-repetition, the need for the State of Brazil to adopt a law on women searchers to guarantee the factual conditions in which they can carry out their search work and mentioned the example of the bill currently pending in Colombia⁶⁸³.

⁶⁸² Concluding remarks of IACHR Commissioner Julissa Mantilla at the hearing held before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights on October 12, 2023 in the Case of Collen Leite et al. v. Brazil.

⁶⁸³ In this regard, the IACHR recently welcomed the approval by the Colombian House of Representatives of the "bill for the comprehensive protection of the work and rights of women and persons searching for victims of enforced disappearance"[1]. In its pronouncement, it highlighted "the importance of protecting relatives of disappeared persons, especially women, who by participating and leading processes of search, investigation and defense of human rights, are affected by particular risks and impacts". 6. Non-repetition measures with a gender and intersectional perspective

219. As indicated in the previous chapter, measures of non-repetition transcend the victims and have the vocation of transforming the conditions that fostered the human rights violations. In the case of gender-based violence in transitional contexts, these measures seek to reverse the situation of discrimination, violence and exclusion in which women live. This section groups together those measures focused on reversing this situation, following the categories used in the previous chapter: (i) measures aimed at the adoption, adaptation or repeal of legislation or other regulations, with a gender or intersectional perspective; (ii) public policies with a gender perspective; (iii) measures regarding the right to truth with a gender perspective; and (iv) training and awareness-raising.

6.1. Measures aimed at the adoption, adaptation or repeal of legislation or other regulations, with a gender and intersectional perspective

220. In situations of gender-based violence in transitional contexts, the IACHR has recommended the adoption of this type of measures to, among other things, ensure that the facts are investigated and that the legal framework addresses the specific needs of women⁶⁸⁴.

Recommendation 64. Ensure that the legal framework and demobilization programs are consistent with international principles and standards on victims' rights to truth, justice and reparation and therefore address the specific needs of women.

6.2. Public policies with a gender and intersectional perspective

221. The IACHR has highlighted the importance of "applying a gender perspective in public policies to achieve equality and a transformative approach in order to address the structural causes of these human rights violations⁶⁸⁷". The Commission has also recalled the importance of using a gender perspective when adopting institutional strengthening measures. It has also referred to the importance of strengthening the State's operational capacity to prevent discrimination and violence against women, girls and adolescents and to respect and protect their human rights⁶⁸⁸. In this regard, the IACHR has positively valued when States have public policies on risk prevention and protection of women's rights in contexts of armed conflict⁶⁸⁹. It has also recognized as a positive development the issuance of judgments that set standards regarding the situation of women in contexts of armed conflict, particularly with respect to those belonging to groups in a particularly vulnerable situation such as displaced women⁶⁹⁰.

222. The following is a systematization of some standards related to various general aspects of public policies with a gender perspective in transitional contexts, as well as other more specific ones related to public policies on memory and protection with a gender perspective.

6.2.1. General Aspects

223. In the framework of public reparation policies in transitional contexts, the IACHR has referred to the participation of women in their design and implementation, to the need for both individual and collective reparation and to the adoption of differentiated criteria for certain populations, such as displaced women, Afro-descendants and women heads of household⁶⁹¹.

226. For his part, the United Nations Rapporteur on the subject has established that the design of memorialization policies should include a gender perspective, in relation to the rights of women and LGBT populations, applying intersectionality⁶⁹⁶. It has also indicated that these policies "should avoid as a result a stereotyped vision of historical memory⁶⁹⁷".

Principle VI "Intercultural and gender approach".

Public policies on memory should respect and promote the construction of the memories of communities, organizations and collectives, based on the recognition of the different cultural visions, conceptions of well-being and development of the various ethnic-cultural groups; as well as the gender approach, tending to the establishment of relations of equity and equality of opportunities and rights.

6.2.3. Public protection policies with a gender and intersectional perspective

227. This section will address public policies specifically aimed at the protection of victims of gender-based violence. This, taking into account the differentiated and disproportionate impact of the armed conflict, dictatorship or authoritarian regime on certain groups of women, particularly women defenders, social leaders, and journalists. This impact, in turn, generates a reinforced duty of protection on the part of the States which, among other issues, results in the obligation to establish special protection mechanisms.

a) Special risk situation of women defenders, social leaders and journalists

228. The bodies of the Inter-American System have referred to the additional risk factors for women defenders and leaders belonging to certain groups in a situation of greater vulnerability, such as indigenous women, Afro-descendants and displaced women⁶⁹⁸. In such situations, States have the duty to address the situation from a perspective that adjusts to the differentiated impact on these women of the risk factors they face⁶⁹⁹.

229. On the other hand, the Court has addressed the particular risk faced by women journalists and the need for States to adopt a strong differential approach when implementing protection measures with respect to this group, which includes a reinforced duty of prevention⁷⁰⁰. In this regard, in addition to the general Inter-American standards on gender-based violence and non-discrimination, States must investigate the special risks faced by women journalists and the factors that increase those risks⁷⁰¹.

IACHR, Report on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders in the Americas, OEA/Ser.L/V/II.124 Doc. 5 rev. 1

In some countries where situations of armed conflict persist, the combatant groups tend to impose social control over the living conditions of women, dictating guidelines for their daily behavior, intervening in family and community conflicts, and applying punishments that go as far as murder, torture and cruel and degrading treatment in the event that they do not conform to the codes of conduct imposed by force. In these cases, the armed actors consider that the leadership exercised by women's organizations constitutes an obstacle that hinders the advancement of their social and territorial control and, consequently, national and regional women's organizations operating in zones of armed conflict are subject to harassment and threats that seriously affect the community work they carry out⁷¹⁵.

231. [...] The Commission has learned that women defenders of the rights of indigenous and Afro-descendant women, in addition to the other forms of discrimination already mentioned, are regular victims of acts of racism, ridicule and stigmatization by the majority communities and, in some cases, by public authorities and within their own communities.

Precautionary measures

IACHR, Resolution 80/21, MC 491-21 - S.G.R.Q. and her family, Colombia, October 4, 2021.

37. [...] Furthermore, in the present case, the situation of particular vulnerability of the proposed beneficiary is accentuated by the fact that she is a woman of African descent and an elderly person, in a situation of forced displacement, and consequently the specific risks she faces due to the intersection of these factors. This implies, therefore, addressing the situation of the proposed beneficiary from a perspective that is adjusted to her condition, as well as in view of the differentiated impact that the risk factors faced would have on her, an assessment that the Commission has in fact already made in the context of other situations that require a differentiated analysis in view of the circumstances⁷¹⁶.

39. [...] Additionally, the Commission has pointed out that Afro-descendant women leaders and defenders who work with displaced persons in the country are among the group of defenders in a special situation of risk⁷¹⁷.

b) Institutional protection mechanisms for women human rights defenders, social leaders and journalists

⁷¹⁶ By way of example, the Commission has considered the differentiated risk faced by pregnant women, women in labor or postpartum, as well as children and adolescents in the framework of their best interests as such, the migrant or displaced population, and persons with disabilities. See in this regard: IACHR. Resolution 13/2019. Precautionary Measure No. 150-19. Concepción Palacios Maternity Hospital with respect to Venezuela. March 18, 2019.

⁷¹⁷ IACHR. Report on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders and Social Leaders in Colombia. OEA/Ser.L/V/II., Doc. 262, 6 December 2019, paras. 47-65; IACHR. Observations and recommendations of the IACHR working visit to Colombia carried out June 8-10, 2021, July 7, 2021, para. 29.

230. Considering the particular risk factors mentioned in the previous section, the IACHR has developed a series of standards applicable to the protection mechanisms that States must adopt to protect women defenders, social leaders and journalists, especially in transitional contexts. Among others, States must apply a differentiated approach in each of the actions developed by the protection programs⁷¹⁸ and, in the risk assessment procedure, the gender approach must have special importance⁷¹⁹. On the other hand, the State response must be immediate from the first moment it becomes aware of the risk, and the persons in charge of the protection mechanism must be duly qualified and trained⁷²⁰. Likewise, protection mechanisms must be adjusted to the situation of aggravated vulnerability that certain groups of women face in the context of armed conflicts.⁷²¹ these programs. Therefore, it is essential that measures be taken to train all the personnel of the different agencies, with the purpose of ensuring its continuous application.

191. The IACHR has already established that the situation of risk to which certain groups of women may be exposed does not always affect all women to the same extent⁷²². In this regard, the Commission has stressed the need for a comprehensive protection policy that is tailored to their needs and that takes into consideration their situation of aggravated vulnerability due to the impact of the armed conflict on their lives. Therefore, the Commission considers it necessary to strengthen the protection of women's organizations working in the interior of the country, especially those that are promoting land restitution processes and that have been subjected to different types of gender-based violence. The Commission also notes the multiple levels of vulnerability that indigenous and Afro-descendant women leaders may face.

193. The Commission urges the State to adopt immediate actions to incorporate in the relevant protocols, guidelines, risk assessment processes, implementation and follow-up of protection measures an approach that takes into consideration the gender expression, gender identity and sexual orientation of the persons who come to the protection program. In this framework, it is considered necessary that all authorities work together to create guidelines and train the relevant authorities on how their risk situation should be assessed, in light of the various forms of violence and social exclusion experienced by LGBTI persons and defenders who work with this issue. 139. [...] In this regard, the IACHR has emphasized that the protection schemes granted to human rights defenders must ensure a gender focus, which integrates the particularities and specific risks faced by groups of women such as Afro-descendant women leaders⁷²³.

IACHR, Report on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders and Social Leaders in Colombia, OEA/Ser.L/V/II. Doc.262/19, December 6, 2019.

221. In this sense, the gender approach should be of particular importance in the risk assessment procedure, since it could result in a differentiated impact on the level of risk, as well as in the implementation of protection measures. In order for the measures to be effective, it is essential that: a) the State respond immediately from the first moment it becomes aware of the existence of the risk, so that they are timely; b) that the persons involved in the protection of human rights defenders have the necessary training and education to perform their functions and on the importance of their actions; and c) they must be in force for as long as the victims of violence or threats need them⁷²⁴.

223. Protection schemes must ensure the inclusion of a differentiated perspective that takes into account the specific vulnerability to violence faced by LGBTI human rights defenders in the process of designing and adopting protection measures⁷²⁵ and an approach that takes into consideration the gender expression, gender identity, and sexual orientation of people who turn to the State for protection must be contemplated⁷²⁶.

314. In light of the above observations, the IACHR takes up the following recommendations addressed to the State of Colombia in its Preliminary Observations of the working visit and, based on the information analyzed and included in this report, adds some additional recommendations:

5. Deepen the context analysis for risk assessment and for the adoption of protection measures, under a differentiated approach that takes into account the particular situations of the population requiring protection and the place where they work. In particular, include the ethnic, collective and gender approach in prevention and protection measures;

13. Adopt differential approaches to gender, ethnicity and LGBTI population, both in the construction of guarantee programs, as well as in research;

53. Consequently, Colombia is requested to:

a) adopt the necessary measures to protect the rights to life and personal integrity of Mrs. S.G.R.Q. and her family. In particular, the State must ensure that the protection measures implemented are sufficiently effective and adequate, with the corresponding ethnic-racial and gender focus, in light of the risks identified in the resolution and in response to the shortcomings indicated;

b) adopt the necessary protection measures so that Mrs. S.G.R.Q. can continue to carry out her activities as a community leader and human rights defender without being subjected to risk events against her;

6.3. Measures in the area of the Right to Truth with a gender and intersectional perspective

230. In establishing the historical truth in transitional justice processes, the IACHR has highlighted the importance of adopting approaches that take into account the differentiated and disproportionate impact of violence on women, girls and adolescents. Such an approach must also be multidimensional and incorporate variables such as forced displacement, sexual violence, among others⁷²⁷. Likewise, the establishment of historical truth and the creation of historical awareness must also include the experiences of trans and gender-diverse victims of past violence⁷²⁸.

Acts of recognition of responsibility can include a series of diverse measures that involve symbolic acts of reparation, such as official statements, requests for forgiveness and historical recognition, or state support for initiatives that seek to document and disseminate the records and testimonies of trans and gender-diverse people who managed to survive the contexts of exclusion and violence in which they were forced to live, especially in contexts of military dictatorships. These policies should be designed and implemented with the ultimate goal of creating historical awareness of this issue.

Similarly, the IACHR calls for strengthening the intersectionality of approaches in the establishment of the historical truth, taking into account that women, the elderly, girls and boys have differentiated and disproportionate impacts, making necessary a holistic and multidimensional approach to the conflict that analyzes variables such as

242. Finally, regarding the rights of women victims to truth, justice and reparation, the Commission notes positively that the provision in Decree No. 588 of 2017 creating, within the Truth Commission a gender working group, responds to the objective of contributing to the investigation and clarification of acts of violence against women⁷²⁹, particularly acts of sexual violence largely silenced. 6.4. Training and awareness raising with a gender perspective

231. From a gender perspective, the IACHR has called on the States to adopt actions aimed at training different authorities, as well as raising awareness among the general population.

V. CONCLUSIONS

V. CONCLUSIONS

234. This Compendium is an updated and easily accessible reference tool for state actors, civil society, academia, other international organizations and users of the System, on a topic of great relevance for the region. These types of cooperation tools are developed by the Inter-American Commission with the objective of promoting greater knowledge and use of inter-American human rights standards.
235. At the same time, the compilation of standards and jurisprudence contained in this Compendium is a practical tool to advance in strengthening the capacities of actors both at the local level and at the level of the International System for the Protection of Human Rights. In this way, the IACHR recalls the importance of States adopting diligent efforts to apply the legal standards of the Inter-American System in the field of human rights⁷³⁹ .
236. The information presented clearly reflects the fundamental role that, for decades, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has played in the progressive establishment of guidelines and directives that have guided the processes and mechanisms of transitional justice that seek to comprehensively redress the harm caused to victims of grave violations in contexts of armed conflict, military dictatorships or other oppressive and authoritarian regimes of the past. As can be seen from the systematization carried out in this Compendium, in such contexts, gender-based discrimination and violence are intensified, generating differentiated risks and impacts. This in turn generates reinforced obligations on the part of the States and the need to adopt a gender approach not only in the prevention and punishment of such violence, but also in the reparation of the consequences of human rights violations suffered by women and LGBTI persons. However, it is observed that the application of a gender perspective and differentiated approaches to reparations in transitional contexts has not been, until recent years, a relevant aspect in the development of standards in the Inter-American System.

237. In this context, this compilation of standards marks a starting point in the treatment of these issues in order to facilitate the continuation of a progressive and innovative development that has as a transversal axis the transformative vocation of reparation. Also, the statements contained in this document make visible: (i) the special situation of risk that girls, women, LGTBI persons, among other groups, face in these contexts, and (ii) the consequent obstacles they face in the effective access to reparation programs, and in their participation in their design and implementation.
238. Based on the analysis and standards contained in this Compendium, it is clear that it is necessary to strengthen the application of the gender perspective and the intersectional approach in transitional justice contexts as a necessary prerequisite to guarantee comprehensive and effective reparation -as well as an adequate response to a situation of structural violence- in transitional scenarios. To this end, attention must be paid to: (i) the differentiated consequences generated by the violation of rights; (ii) the prevailing gender stereotypes; (iii) the other specific conditions and particularities that generate a special situation of risk for women, LGBTI persons and other groups; and (iv) the need to combat structural inequality and exclusion, including the patterns and stereotypes of discrimination that facilitated the perpetration of violations in armed conflicts, military dictatorships or other oppressive and authoritarian regimes. Likewise, it is essential that States guarantee -through differentiated treatment- the effective participation of women, LGBTI persons and other populations in all stages of reparation mechanisms, that is, from their design to their implementation. Without this, there is a risk that reparation measures will ignore gender-based violence and violence based on other discriminatory factors that operate in these contexts.

239. In view of the above, gender and intersectionality should be considered as guiding principles in reparations -adopted in light of their transformative vocation- in order to combat the underlying causes of the serious human rights violations in these scenarios, and the structure of gender exclusion and other additional factors of discrimination. The above, also, with a view to generating a symbolic effect that contributes to the satisfaction and non-repetition of the facts. The IACHR also emphasizes that the cross-cutting approach of differentiated approaches included in this Compendium also responds to the cross-cutting theme of "Gender, interculturality, and intersectionality," contained in the current IACHR Strategic Plan 2023-2027.
240. Finally, the Inter-American Commission reiterates its willingness, commitment and full disposition to collaborate with the States through technical assistance and cooperation as a tool for institutional strengthening with the objective of contributing to guaranteeing real and objective conditions for the materialization of State efforts and initiatives in the area of reparations in transitional justice contexts, integrating the gender perspective in a cross-cutting manner in all phases of its implementation.
